

NYPL RESEARCH LIBRARIES

3 3433 07954828 9

Presented by J Ferris Lockwood
to the
New York Public Library

(F. 12. 300.)
ZET

MANUAL OF
CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES

PROFESSOR GEORGE P. FISHER'S WORKS.

"Topics of profound interest to the studious inquirer after truth are discussed by the author with his characteristic breadth of view, catholicity of judgment, affluence of learning, felicity of illustration, and force of reasoning. . . . His singular candor disarms the prepossessions of his opponents. . . . In these days of pretentious, shallow, and garrulous scholarship, his learning is as noticeable for its solidity as for its compass."—
N. Y. TRIBUNE.

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. 8vo, with Maps.....	$3.50
SUPERNATURAL ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY; with Special Reference to the Theories of Renan, Strauss, and the Tübingen School. New Edition, Crown 8vo.....	2.50
THE REFORMATION. New Edition, Crown 8vo.....	2.50
THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY; with a View of the State of the Roman World at the Birth of Christ. New Edition, Crown 8vo.....	2.50
FOUNDATIONS OF THEISTIC AND CHRISTIAN BELIEF. Crown 8vo.....	2.50
DISCUSSIONS IN HISTORY AND THEOLOGY. 8vo.	3.00
FAITH AND RATIONALISM; with Short Supplementary Essays on Related Topics. New Edition, 12mo.....	.75
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. New Edition, 16mo, Cloth.....	.50

MANUAL OF
CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES

BY

GEORGE PARK FISHER, D.D., LL.D.

TITUS STREET PROFESSOR OF ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY IN YALE UNIVERSITY

NEW YORK
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

1888

COPYRIGHT, 1888, BY CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

TROW'S
PRINTING AND BOOKBINDING COMPANY,
NEW YORK.

PREFACE.

THE half-formed intention to write a short manual of Christian Evidences, which I had for some time entertained, took a definite form on account of requests coming to me from persons entitled to respect, some of whom were engaged in the practical work of teaching. It appeared to me that a brief book, confining itself to the Evidences of Revealed Religion, and setting forth in a connected form the principal topics of definition and proof, would be useful to readers and to pupils who have not time for the study of more extended treatises.¹

Paley's Evidences, which was so long the standard text-book on the subject, notwithstanding the signal merits which characterize it, has one striking fault. To the internal evidence a very subordinate place is assigned. The argument for miracles is deprived of the legitimate, if not indispensable, advantage which is gained by a preliminary view of the need and the intrinsic excellence of the Christian Revelation. Moreover, the aspects of skepticism and disbelief have somewhat changed since Paley's time. Books like Strauss's "Life of Jesus" had not then been written. Patristic study has also made advances. The proofs from this source require some revision. Besides, Paley's work is too long for the demands of those for whom the present manual is designed.

¹ In "The Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief" (Charles Scribner's Sons, 1883), I have handled the main topics of Natural Theology, and have presented more in detail the proofs of Revelation. In that work, controverted points are discussed more at length.

G. P. F.

NEW HAVEN, May 16, 1888.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

	PAGE
WHAT IS TO BE PROVED AND THE NATURE OF THE EVIDENCE,	1

CHAPTER II.

WHAT IS MEANT BY MIRACLES? THE POSSIBILITY OF THEM, AND THE POSSIBILITY OF PROVING THEM,	9
--	---

CHAPTER III.

HOW THE ANTECEDENT PRESUMPTION AGAINST THE OCCURRENCE OF MIRACLES IS SET ASIDE,	21
---	----

CHAPTER IV.

ADMITTED FACTS RESPECTING CHRISTIANITY,	28
---	----

CHAPTER V.

PROOF OF THE SUPERNATURAL ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY FROM THE PORTRAITURE OF THE CHARACTER OF JESUS IN THE EVANGELISTS,	32
---	----

	PAGE
CHAPTER VI.
PROOF OF THE MIRACLES FROM PECULIAR FEATURES OF THE GOSPEL NARRATIVES,	37
CHAPTER VII.
PROOF OF THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS FROM STATE- MENTS BY THE APOSTLE PAUL,	41
CHAPTER VIII.
THE GENUINENESS OF THE GOSPELS,	47
CHAPTER IX.
TRUSTWORTHINESS OF THE TESTIMONY OF THE APOS- TLES,	71
CHAPTER X.
THE PROOF OF THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS FROM THE EVANGELISTS,	82
CHAPTER XI.
ALLEGED ERRORS OF THE APOSTLES IN MATTERS OF OPINION,	86
CHAPTER XII.
ALLEGED DIFFICULTIES IN THE CONNECTION OF CHRIST- IANITY WITH THE OLD TESTAMENT RELIGION,	91
CHAPTER XIII.
PROOF OF CHRISTIANITY FROM PROPHECY,	95

CHAPTER XIV.

	PAGE
ARGUMENT FOR CHRISTIANITY FROM THE CONVERSION AND THE CAREER OF THE APOSTLE PAUL,	99

CHAPTER XV.

PROOF OF THE DIVINE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY FROM THE INTRINSIC EXCELLENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN SYSTEM,	103
---	-----

CHAPTER XVI.

PROOF AFFORDED BY THE CONTRAST OF CHRISTIANITY WITH OTHER RELIGIONS AND WITH PHILOSOPHICAL SYSTEMS,	107
---	-----

CHAPTER XVII.

CORROBORATIVE PROOF OF THE TRUTH OF CHRISTIAN- ITY FROM ITS UTILITY,	114
---	-----

CHAPTER XVIII.

CORROBORATIVE PROOF OF CHRISTIANITY FROM ITS RAPID SPREAD IN THE FIRST CENTURIES,	117
--	-----

INDEX,	121
------------------	-----

CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES.

CHAPTER I.

WHAT IS TO BE PROVED AND THE NATURE OF THE EVIDENCE.

THE design of this book is to prove that the narratives of the life of Jesus which are contained in the New Testament are true, and that Christianity has a supernatural, divine origin and sanction. Did Christ speak from himself, or was his doctrine "of God" in a sense not to be affirmed of any system of which man alone is the author?¹ Is Christianity, in distinction from other religions, stamped with an authoritative character, as being a revelation from God? If the history of Jesus as it is recorded in the Gospels, and of the planting of the Church as it is described in the Acts and the Epistles, is worthy of belief, these questions must have an affirmative answer.

The subject of the present inquiry should be kept distinctly in view. The purpose is not to prove the truths of natural religion. The existence of God and the fact of his government of the world are taken for granted. It is true that, through the impression which Christianity makes, one may have his doubts on these fundamental points removed. Christianity, even prior to the examination of its external proofs, may awaken a more clear perception of the being of God, and a more firm and vivid conviction of the free and responsible nature of man, and of the reality of a future life. But great as the quickening and enlightening influence of Revelation may be in this direction, it is the function of Natural Theology to set forth the grounds of theism and what reasons exist for believing man to be immortal. Nor is it our purpose to take up the question of the inspiration of the Scriptures—the question whether, and to what extent, the authors of the books of the Bible were aided by the Spirit of God in the composition of them. This is an important topic of theology, but it is not involved in our present undertaking. Nor, once more, is it necessary to inquire whether or not the Gospel narratives are free from discrepancies and like imperfections, such as pertain in some degree to the most trustworthy historical writings. The substantial verity of the New Testament histories is the only point that we are at present called upon to establish. We may illustrate these distinctions.

¹ — "whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself," John vii. 17 (Revised Version).

What it is not designed to prove.

John Marshall wrote the Life of Washington. He had personally known Washington and, besides, resorted to authentic documents and to other sources of information. Marshall was an intelligent and upright man. Hence the biography which he composed is substantially accurate. It is conceivable, however, that Washington should have himself read the proof-sheets, and (supposing his own memory to be perfect) have removed all errors, even the most minute, or even that he should have dictated the entire biography, with the exception of the account of his own death. But the author, whether he wrote with these special advantages or not, was so placed as to be qualified to produce a narrative which should be in all its material features correct.

Meaning of "Genuineness" and of "Credibility." In the Evidences of Christianity are included the proofs of the genuineness and of the credibility of the New Testament writings. A writing is genuine if it was written by the author to whom it is ascribed. But it is well to remark that a narrative may be credible, or authentic, even if the ordinary view taken of its authorship is mistaken. If Julius Cæsar's Commentaries, in which he speaks of himself in the third person, were to be found to have been written, not by him, but by an intelligent and truthful Roman officer who was with him through the Gallic wars, or even by some competent person to whom Cæsar had related the facts, that work, although not genuine, would still be authentic. Respecting the New Testament histories, the main point to be first established is that they present fairly the testimony of the Apostles, the immediate companions of Jesus. The question of the authorship of these books is important, but that of their date and of other circumstances relating to their origin and early reception, are of more vital consequence.

The proofs of the truth of the Gospel histories are of the same kind as those on which our belief in other historical works is founded.

What is historical evidence?

We require as the warrant for believing in such narratives that they shall rest upon credible testimony of witnesses or well-informed contemporaries. A certain value belongs to tradition—a value varying with the degree of nearness of the events, and in some measure with other circumstances. Moreover, a great many things may serve to corroborate—or else to disprove—historical statements. Occurrences, if they are of a very important character, produce effects upon society in a great many different ways. These effects remain as monuments of the events in which they had their origin. Thus, the great fact of the War of the American Revolution is attested by the existence of the Republic of the United States, and by the character of its institutions, not to dwell on minor consequences, such as the public observances which commemorate the birth of the nation.

The evidences of Christianity, like historical proofs generally, are probable, as distinguished from demonstrative. In the case of demonstrative proof, the opposite of the thing asserted is not only false; it is inconceivable. This is not true of anything depending on probable or moral evidence. There are degrees of probability. Thus we say of one thing that it is "slightly probable;" of another, that it is "very probable;" and of a third, that it is "extremely," or "in the highest degree" probable. It should be observed, however, that in numberless cases where the evidence is of the kind termed "probable," we are absolutely free from doubt. We may never have seen London, but we have not a whit more doubt that London exists than we have that the sum of the three angles of a triangle is equal to two right angles. We never saw Napoleon the First, but we are not less certain that Napoleon lived than we are that two parallel lines, however prolonged, will never meet. To entertain a doubt on the one proposition would be as decisive a proof of insanity as to entertain a doubt on the other.

The proofs of Christianity are cumulative. This is a circumstance which inquirers and disputants are very apt to overlook. In regard to all the main propositions involved in the case, the evidence is made up of many particulars,

Nature of probable evidence.

The evidence cumulative.

all together pointing to the same conclusion. Under this head there are two mistakes to be avoided. One consists in demanding a demonstration for each item in the evidence, where, in the nature of things, no demonstration is possible. The other mistake, which is hardly less grave, is in isolating each particular of proof, as if it stood by itself. It is the old error of assuming that because a single rod may perchance be broken, the whole bundle is equally fragile.

The proofs of Christianity are either internal, or external. The external evidence is the testimony, simply considered, to the facts which are related in the Gospels. The internal evidence includes everything in the system of Christianity itself which is adapted to inspire faith in its truth and divine origin. "Christianity is founded upon certain great primary wants and affections of the human soul, which it meets, to which it corresponds, and of which it furnishes the proper objects and satisfactions. There is the feeling after a God; there is the instinct of prayer; there is conscience and the sense of sin; there is the longing for and dim expectation of immortality. Christianity supplies the counterpart of these affections and wants of the soul, and it is as supplying this counterpart that it recommends itself in the first instance to us; it appeals to our belief upon the strength of its own characteristics, at the same time that it comes before us as a subject of external evidence. The nature of Christianity, and its correspondence to our own nature, has a legitimate influence upon our minds, before any other consideration; it is one part of the whole Christian evidence, and a valid and necessary part, without which the other, or the historical proof, is reasonably and logically deficient.”¹

"External"
and "Internal"
Evidence.

It will be generally acknowledged that for the due appreciation of the evidences of Revelation, earnest attention and a candid temper are requisite. It must be added that the affections form one element in determining the judgment. On other subjects it is true that the data for a judgment must be drawn in part from other sources than the understanding. It is plain that in deciding questions in the fine arts—such as the genuineness of a painting or the merit of a piece of music—a sympathetic tact, native or acquired, is demanded. The like is true respecting questions where the moral excellence, whether of teaching or of personal character, is involved. The evidence is made up in part of impressions, and these depend on the inward state of the person who is to pass judgment. “We cannot possibly enter deeply into character without affections; we cannot estimate or comprehend truly, we cannot embrace keenly and with a living force, what is beautiful,

The affections
as a source of proof.

¹ J. B. Mozley's Lectures and other Theological Papers, p. 3.

profound, and touching in the mind and disposition of any person of extraordinary goodness, unless there are affections in us which enable us to seize hold of their moral traits, and inspire us with a vivid admiration and appreciation of them.”¹ In all such cases, when one is confronted with moral evidence, there is a probation of character.

¹ Ibid., page 8.

CHAPTER II.

WHAT IS MEANT BY MIRACLES? THE POSSIBILITY OF THEM, AND THE POSSIBILITY OF PROVING THEM.

The most common objection both to the genuineness and the credibility of the New Testament histories is from the accounts of miracles, which they contain. It is expedient, at the outset, to consider what weight belongs to this objection, and also to determine what place should be assigned to miracles among the proofs of revelation.

What is a miracle? A miracle is an event which Definition of a miracle. the forces of nature—including the natural powers of man—cannot of themselves produce, and which must, therefore, be referred to a supernatural agency. Or, in the briefer phrase of Pascal, a miracle is an event exceeding the natural power of the means employed. If the event is of such a character, or takes place under such circumstances, as to exclude the supposition of a superhuman created agent as its cause, then it must be inferred that God is its author. It should be added, to complete the idea of a miracle, that it is something manifest—something that can be known and apprehended by men. There is a course of nature—a natural order—the same antecedents being followed by the same consequents. This order of succession we call the uniformity of nature. It enables us, on the ground of previous observation, to predict what will occur. In an atmosphere of 32° Fahrenheit water will freeze. In a warmer atmosphere it will remain fluid. A body of less specific gravity than the air will rise; a body of greater specific gravity than the air will fall. A deviation in any instance from this order of sequences is what is meant by a miracle. But to fill out the ordinary signification of the word, the fact must occur in connection with religious teaching, or as a verification of the claim of a religious teacher to a divine commission. In the New Testament, three terms are used to denote miracles. They are called “wonders,” primarily in reference to the astonishment which they produce; “powers,” as related to the divine energy to which they are due; and “signs,” or tokens of God’s presence and of the sanction thus afforded to the teacher or to what is taught.¹

It is contended by some that a miracle is impossible; by others that, even if it be not impossible, it can never be proved.

¹ For example: “Signs and wonders” (John iv. 48); “powers” (Matt. xi. 20, Revised Version, in the margin). The rendering of the original word (found in Matt. xi. 20, etc.) is usually “mighty works.”

1. It is said that an event not produced by natural laws would be an event without a cause. But what is natural law? By natural law is simply meant the method of the action of natural forces. Laws are another name for the established sequences—that is, the customary succession—of natural phenomena. When a miracle occurs, a new cause intervenes—viz., a special exertion of divine power, the power of the Creator and Upholder of nature. There is not even a violation of natural laws, in the proper sense of the phrase; for every statement of natural law, and every prediction of what is to occur under it, are made with the proviso, or on the tacit supposition, that there is to be no intervention of a supernatural agent. A miracle nowise contradicts the axiom that in nature the same causes, under the same circumstances, are followed by the same effects. In the case of a miracle, the effect is different because the causes are not the same. The variation in the effect is what must take place, supposing such an alteration of the antecedents. If a new cause comes in, it is irrational to look for the same effect as before.

As we pass from one kingdom of nature to another, we find that higher forces control the action of lower, so that new effects are produced which could not otherwise occur. Inorganic nature in this way is subject to vital forces. The force of

Not an event without a cause.

gravitation, for example, gives way under the action of a superior agency of another kind. Out of the seed rises the stalk of the plant.

Forces overcome by forces in nature. If we had no knowledge of organic nature, we might be led to deny the possibility of such a fact as the movement upward of a growing tree, despite the force of gravitation.

The human will affords the most striking illustration of the possibility of a miracle. The will, as related to material forces, is a distinct and higher power, and as thus related is supernatural. It initiates movements in the realm of nature. It produces results—countless in number and variety—which would not have come into being independently of its action. When a boy throws a ball into the air, gravitation is overcome by forces set in motion by a human volition. Whoever bakes a loaf of bread brings into being a thing which the bare forces of nature, not controlled and assisted by man's will, could not have produced. In this way human will-power creates all that goes under the comprehensive name of art. From the least motion of a finger, in obedience to volition, to the most complex contrivances of mechanical genius, from the building of a wigwam to the erection of a Gothic cathedral, from the management of a village-school to the leading of armies and the government of nations—in a word, wherever the effects of human will appear, there are beheld phenomena which the laws of nature—apart from the guidance, combination, and control of them by man's will—could never have brought into being. A miracle, where there is an interposition of the divine will, is not anti-natural, but super-natural.

The human will, supernatural.

2. But it is objected that the invariability of nature—when the human will with its range of activities is included—is a truth which it is absurd to call in question. This objection assumes that the uniformity of nature is intuitively known, is a necessary truth, and stands thus on a level with mathematical axioms. No sound philosopher will make such an assertion. Our belief that the course of things is uniform is based on observation and experience, coupled with an instinctive confidence in the indications—indicia—of nature, like the trust which we put in the signs of thought when we are in communication with human beings. A child who has once burned his finger in the flame, knows that if he makes a second experiment of the same sort, the same result will occur. We naturally assume that nature is an orderly system, that it is conformed to a plan, and is not made to deceive us. Our belief in the uniformity of nature justifies a presumption that there will be (and has been) no departure from it. This presumption, however, may be overruled and set aside, wherever reasons exist which would make it wise in the Author and Ruler of Nature to intervene.

The uniformity of nature.

3. It is objected that a miracle would be a contravention by God of the laws of nature which He has himself established. Even were it so, the laws of nature are not moral laws. An interference with them would not involve in itself any moral wrong. The foregoing remarks show how one class of natural forces may counteract and govern the action of another, or the results to be produced by that action. Moreover, Natural Theology teaches that natural laws do not exist for their own sake. The end of material nature is not in itself. A "law" is merely a name for the way in which things ordinarily occur. On the supposition that a higher good is to be secured by a deviation from the course of nature, there is no moral objection to such an act on the part of God. If this objection had any weight, it would tend to prove not the natural, but only the moral impossibility of miracles. But the objection is stripped of its plausibility the moment one admits that there is a moral government of the world as well as an administering of physical laws. Nature is not a thing by itself. It is only one province in the whole divine system. The motives that dictate the establishment and maintenance of the course of nature may require that it should not be absolutely without interruption.

Miracle and natural law.

4. Hume made a celebrated argument against the possibility of proving miracles by testimony, although the same argument had long before been stated and answered in one of South's sermons.¹ Our belief in the uniformity of nature, Hume said, rests on experience. Our belief in testimony has the same foundation. But the experience of the uniformity of nature is without any exception; whereas, we have had experience of the error of human testimony. Hence he concluded that no amount of testimony could prove a miracle; for, if we suppose the amount of evidence of this sort to be never so great, still the supposition of its falsehood would imply at most nothing greater than a miracle, and so we should have a miracle to balance a miracle.

Hume's argument involves several mistakes and fallacies. Our belief in testimony does not grow out of experience, although as the result of experience it is regulated. Nor does our belief in the uniformity of nature spring exclusively or ultimately from this source. On Hume's philosophy no reason can be assigned for expecting the course of nature to remain unaltered. Why should the future be, and the past have been, conformed to what we observe at present? We grant, however, that there is a rational presumption in favor of the uniformity of nature, and against the occurrence of a miracle. The very word "miracle," pointing to the wonder excited by such an event, implies a counter-expectation. But when Hume assumes that experience is uniform against the occurrence of miracles, he begs the question. The evidence for the unbroken uniformity of nature, as J. S. Mill has correctly stated, is diminished in force by whatever weight belongs to the evidence that certain miracles have taken place.¹ Hume separates a miracle from every conceivable object. He looks at it as a perfectly isolated occurrence—a bare marvel. His fundamental error consists in arguing the question on the tacit assumption of atheism. He ignores the existence of a cause adequate to work miracles, and, of course, the existence of any motive or occasion for them to be wrought. If the righteous God, whose existence and attributes are verified in Natural Theology, could be deemed as likely to subvert the laws which justify belief in human testimony, as—for example—to heal a man born blind, in order to furnish a sign and proof that salvation has been provided from spiritual darkness and sin, Hume's reasoning would be more plausible. In other words, he virtually takes it for granted that one miracle—a miracle for a purpose of deception—is as much to be expected as another miracle, wrought for a worthy and merciful end. All that Hume has made out,

¹ South's Sermon on The Certainty of our Saviour's Resurrection.

¹ Mill's System of Logic, vol. ii., p. 185.

as Mill explains, is that no evidence can prove a miracle to an atheist, or to a deist who supposes himself able to prove that God would not interfere to produce the miraculous event in question. Mill adds truly "that natural religion is the necessary basis of revealed ; that the proofs of Christianity presuppose the being and moral attributes of God ; that it is the conformity of a religion to those attributes which determines whether credence ought be given to its external evidences."¹

J. S. Mill on Hume's argument.

Professor Huxley, in his comments on Hume, objects to Hume's definition of a miracle as a violation of the laws of nature, "because all we know of the order of nature is derived from an observation of the course of events of which the so-called miracle is a part."² He admits that an event of this character is capable of being proved by testimony ; but he appears to think that, if thus established, it would be an occurrence under the laws of nature, and would be referable to natural causes. This explanation, however, in many conceivable cases, would be irrational. If a man is known to be dead and is awakened to life at the command of another, the effect could not be referred to natural causes. If it could, a superhuman knowledge of natural causes would have to be ascribed to him who gave the command, and this would involve miracle. The coincidence of the occurrence with the word or act of a person Miracle proves design. “proves design in the marvel, and makes it a miracle; and if that person professes to report a message or revelation from heaven, the coincidence again of the miracle with the professed message of God proves design on the part of God to warrant and authorize the message.” That is to say, the occurrence of the marvel at the moment when the man is bidden to arise cannot be a mere coincidence.

Huxley's position.

¹ Mill's System of Logic, vol. ii., p. 186.

² Huxley's Hume, p. 151.

5. The question is sometimes asked, How can we be certain that an effect which exceeds the power of natural causes, does not spring from the agency of a superhuman evil being? Can evil spirits work miracles?

There are certain miracles, such, in particular, as imply the exertion of creative power, which it appears unreasonable to attribute to any created being. But, apart from this consideration, there may be collateral proof—moral evidence—that shows the miracle to be the work of no evil being, and of no other being than God. It is to such evidence that, according to the Gospel narrative, Jesus appeals in answer to the allegation that his miracles were wrought by the help of evil spirits.¹

¹ Matt. xii. 25, 26; Mark xiii. 23, 24; Luke xi. 17, 18.

What is the distinctive office and place of miracles among the evidences of Revelation? In the first place, it is plain that Revelation, as distinguished from the manifestation of God in the course of nature and the ordinary doings of Providence, is in its very idea miraculous. It is a more direct disclosure of God than is elsewhere afforded. This fact of the presence and more immediate agency of God in connection with religious doctrine is signified to the senses by works of supernatural power. These works corroborate the evidence furnished by the doctrine itself, and by all the proofs of a moral nature that attend the promulgation of it. Miracles are aids to faith. They come in with decisive effect to convince those who are impressed by the moral evidence that they are not deceived, and that God is in reality speaking through men. According to the New Testament histories it was in this light that miracles were regarded by Jesus. Where there was no spiritual preparation, no dawning faith, he refused to perform miracles. He set the highest value upon the moral proofs.¹ Yet he considered the miracles to be of use in proving himself to be the messenger of God and to have power committed to him to forgive sin.²

Proof from miracles and from doctrine.

¹ John xiv. 11.

² Matt. ix. 6; Mark ii. 10; Luke ix. 24.

Thus it appears that while the doctrine proves the miracles the miracles prove the doctrine. They are two mutually supporting species of proof. They are both parts of one manifestation of God, neither of which is to be relied upon to the exclusion of the other, as if the other were of no value.

Mutual support of doctrine and miracles.

CHAPTER III.

HOW THE ANTECEDENT PRESUMPTION AGAINST THE OCCURRENCE OF MIRACLES IS SET ASIDE.

By a presumption is meant such a previous likelihood that a given statement is true or false as

Meaning of "presumption."

justly predisposes one to believe or to reject it. On the ground of some principle, or prior conviction, which is based on evidence, we bring to the consideration of a question a favorable or an adverse pre-judgment. This may have different degrees of strength, varying with the character of the evidence on which it rests. If we hear that one known to be a miser has made a large gift to the poor, or that one known to be a generous philanthropist has refused to relieve a worthy person who was in distress, there is a presumption in each case that the report is false. What gives rise to the presumption against the truth of the proposition that a miracle has occurred is the known fact of the uniformity of nature and the obvious benefit of such an arrangement. On the ground of this faith in an established course of nature, we feel justified in passing over, without credence, and even without inquiry, stories of miracles which are met with in historians whose records of ordinary occurrences we have no hesitation in believing. We give credit to what Tacitus relates about the wars of Vespasian, but when he tells the story of the healing of a blind man by that Emperor, we smile at the tale, or at most try to conjecture in what way the erroneous report had arisen. To set aside this presumption against the miraculous, it is requisite that we should discern the need of a Revelation and appreciate in some degree the intrinsic excellence of the Christian system. Then the way will be open to examine the evidence which shows that the miracles recorded in the New Testament were actually wrought.

“I deem it unnecessary to prove,” says Paley, “that mankind stood in need of a revelation, because I have met with no serious person who thinks that, even under the Christian revelation, we have too much light, or any degree of persuasion which is superfluous.” The anterior probability that a revelation will be given lies in the necessitous condition of man and the benevolent character of God.

There is no interest of man so important as religion. It is vitally connected with his obligations and his destiny. In relation to this subject there are four principal sources of anxiety and distress. The first is the vagueness and uncertainty of man’s probability of revelation.

Antecedent

knowledge, under the light of nature, of God and divine things. The question is not what is theoretically possible to be ascertained on these themes, or what the extent of the native power of reason is, but rather what man, in his present condition and character, actually does discover or can be expected to discover. We find that there is neither absolute ignorance and a satisfied state of ignorance, nor is there such a vividness and certainty of conviction as give rest to the mind and furnish an adequate incentive to right conduct. Man "feels after God," gropes in the dark as for an object of which he knows something, but which he cannot find and grasp. We perceive that men oscillate between gross superstition and a dismal unbelief. On the question of the immortality of the soul there is a like uncertainty, a mixture of hope and doubt. This was the position of a man so virtuous and elevated as Socrates.

The need of revelation.
Four points:
1. The need of knowledge.

There is, besides, a sense of unworthiness which haunts the mind and often becomes an oppressive burden. There is a sense of guilt which reveals itself in the rites of the religions of the heathen nations. It is the consciousness of being unreconciled to the Power on whom we depend and to whom a more or less distinct feeling of responsibility prevails among mankind.

2. The guilt of sin.

Moreover, there is a feeling of discontent and helplessness under the dominion which evil has acquired in the heart. There is a bondage of habit which often gives rise to an ineffectual struggle and to a craving for supernatural help. A heathen poet expresses the sense of this slavery, when he says: "I see and approve what is good; I do what is evil."

3. The bondage of sin.

"Video meliora proboque; Deteriora sequor."—HORACE.

Even Byron speaks of "This uneradicable taint of sin,

This boundless upas, this all-blasting tree—"

In addition to these necessities of the soul, there is the need, under the sufferings of life, of sources of strength, such as the light of nature does not afford. Relief under afflictions, peace in sorrow, salvation from despondency, are wants which are deeply felt.

4. The burden of pain and sorrow.

We cannot dwell on these great facts respecting mankind. No one who interrogates his own conscience, and looks abroad on the world and over the field of history, can fail to be impressed by them.

While there is a great need of man to be supplied, a need which experience proves that he cannot himself supply through his own unaided powers, there are, likewise, indications in nature of the benevolence of God.

The benevolence of God.

This character is brought to light in the teachings of Natural Theology. Even heathen writers—for example, Plutarch—have written on the Delay of God in punishing the wicked, and have inferred His compassion and desire to save the unworthy.

The way in which Christianity meets the deep wants of human nature which have been briefly described, is one strong proof of its divine origin. It forms an important portion of the internal evidence of the truth of the Gospel, and of its being a revelation from God. But in this place, where we are only considering whether there is a probability that miracles will occur—such a probability as sets aside the contrary presumption—we can only call attention to features of the Christian system which everybody must acknowledge to exist.

1. Christianity sets forth the main truths of natural religion in a clear and vivid form. The being of God, his moral and providential government, man's accountableness, the future life, are taught, and are taught so impressively that, as a matter of fact, multitudes of men have been persuaded of their truth, and have been moved to cast aside heathen superstitions, as well as skepticism and disbelief.

2. Christianity does not hide or extenuate the evil which has been depicted above. It brings out

Christianity
meets the needs of man.

It sets forth the truths of natural religion.

with emphasis the sin and guilt of men, and whatever is distressing in their lot, including their mortality. In short, Christianity recognizes the full extent of the malady and professes to grapple with it.

3. Christianity makes definite provisions to meet the great wants which have been specified, viz., the vagueness of our knowledge of God, the stings of conscience, the need of fresh incentives, and of spiritual aid from without, for the conflict with evil habit within the soul, and to lighten the burdens of sorrow and affliction.

Not only does Christianity undertake thus to bring men to a true knowledge of God and fellowship with Him, but history shows that, in innumerable instances, this result has been effected. Strength to bear the heaviest troubles has been gained, together with peace and the light of hope in the presence of death.

The moral precepts of Christianity are conformed to the dictates of conscience. These precepts, as far as they relate to our relations to one another, may be comprised under the heads of veracity, purity, kindness. Sincerity in speech and conduct, chastity in thought and behavior, benevolence, sympathy, charitableness in judgment and action, are the leading injunctions of the Gospel.

The history of Christianity proves that the practice of these virtues is facilitated, and the conquest over the opposite vices is achieved, by means of the faith and hope of the Gospel. In other words, the religion of the Gospel, entering into the convictions and experience of the soul, is a most effective instrument of moral reform. The legitimate result of Christianity, it is not too much to say, is "a new creation" of spiritual and ethical character.

Connection of faith and morals.

These considerations are sufficient to neutralize the presumption against miracles in connection with Christianity and to place them on the same level, as regards proof, with matters of fact where no miracle is involved. For, if the miracles were subtracted, its distinctive character as a direct approach of God to man would be lost, an essential side of the evidence of its truth would vanish, and its practical efficacy would be to a great extent paralyzed. In judging of Christianity, it is desirable to remember, as Paley observes, that "the question lies between this religion and none; for, if the Christian religion be not credible, no one with whom we have to do will support the pretensions of any other"—certainly not the pretensions of any other to a supernatural origin and a miraculous attestation.

CHAPTER IV.

ADMITTED FACTS RESPECTING CHRISTIANITY.

Before proceeding further, it is well to remind the reader how much there is in Christianity that is not a subject of dispute. Let us glance at some of the admitted facts. Christianity originated in the short ministry of Jesus of Nazareth. This ministry was preceded by the preaching of John the Baptist, to whose preaching and the effect of it the Jewish historian, Josephus, refers.¹ Jesus selected and trained a small company of disciples, who, like himself, were of a humble rank in life. He taught not longer than about three years, from place to place, in Palestine. He was condemned by the Jewish Sanhedrim, and was put to death under Pontius Pilate, the Roman Procurator in Judea. The religion of the Jews, among whom he was born and grew up, was a pure form of monotheism. In it was involved an expectation of a universal divine kingdom, of which the "Messiah" was to be the head. Jesus professed to be the expected Messiah, and on this account he was put to death. His teachings and his life had made a powerful impression. Soon after his death his

Its origin in the life of Jesus.

The Jewish religion.

¹ Antiq., xviii. v. 2.

His alleged resurrection. chosen followers testified that he had risen, and manifested himself to them.

This alleged fact they proclaimed, and submitted to great sufferings, and some of them to a cruel death, on account of their faith and of the testimony which they gave respecting Jesus. A few

The conversion of Paul. years after the death of Jesus, Saul of Tarsus, who had been active in persecuting his followers, was converted to the Christian faith, and became an untiring and zealous preacher of it. In the face of persecution from Jews and heathen, and without the advantage of support from the learned, the rich, or any other of the influential Rapid spread of the Gospel. classes, the new religion rapidly spread in the cities of the Roman Empire. The Roman historian, Tacitus, informs us that in the time of Nero, the Christians who were tortured and killed by that tyrant formed "a great multitude."¹ This was in 64 A.D. The younger Pliny, Proprætor in Pontus and Bithynia, under Trajan, reports to the Emperor, in 111 A.D., that the number of Christians in that region was so large that the heathen altars had been well-nigh deserted, and there had been no market for the sale of animals for sacrifice.² The Gospel continued to make progress, in spite of legal measures of persecution and the violence of mobs, and notwithstanding that more than one able Emperor engaged with energy in systematic efforts to exterminate its disciples. At length the Emperor himself, Constantine, became a convert, and (A.D. 313) proclaimed toleration. The old heathen religion of the Græco-Roman world disappeared. The new barbarian nations which subverted Rome embraced Christianity. It is the religion of the most powerful nations, whom it did so much to train and civilize. It is now professed by nearly a third of the world's population.

¹ Annal, xv. 44.

² Plin., Ep. 97.

Christians were united together from the beginning in forms of organization. The Church grew up, and, under varying forms of polity and modes of worship, has perpetuated itself until the present day. Certain rites, such as Baptism, the Lord's Supper, and the observance of Sunday, have been continued since the days of the Apostles. Numberless productions—theological, devotional, or otherwise practical—have emanated from Christian teachers, or from other Christian disciples in successive ages.

It is allowed that the influence of Christianity has not been superficial, but of a profound, transforming character upon the individual and upon society. It has deeply affected art, literature, and laws, the sentiments and conduct of mankind. Whatever evil has been

The Church
and its rites,

The influence of Christianity.

done in the name of the Christian religion, is due, as is generally conceded, not to that religion itself, but to the perversion and corruption of it. With the possible exception of a few eccentric individuals, it is universally judged that the influence of Christianity upon human nature and upon civilization is altogether elevating and wholesome.

These bare outlines may serve to remind the reader how grand a phenomenon Christianity is in the history of the world. The question which we have to consider is whether the New Testament histories give the true account of its origin. It will not do to dispose of this question by vague remarks on human credulity and the possibilities of self-deception and imposture. "To put aside the question of its origin"—of the origin of the Christian religion—"by telling us that mankind are easily deceived, is much the same as it would be to put aside the question about the origin of the Gulf Stream by telling us that water is an element very easily moved in different directions."¹

¹ Hopkins's Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity.

CHAPTER V.

PROOF OF THE SUPERNATURAL ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY FROM THE PORTRAITURE OF THE CHARACTER OF JESUS IN THE EVANGELISTS.

The character of Jesus as it is depicted in the Evangelists is one of unequalled excellence. This is universally admitted. It is not a character made up of negative virtues alone, where the sole merit is the absence of culpable traits. It has Combination of virtues. positive, strongly marked features. It combines piety, an absorbing love and loyalty to God, with philanthropy—a love to men without any alloy of selfishness, and too strong to be conquered by their injustice and ingratitude. It unites thus, in perfect harmony, the qualities of the saint and of the philanthropist. It blends holiness with compassion and gentleness. There is no compromise with evil, no consent to the least wrong-doing, even in a friend or follower. But with this purity there is a deep well of tenderness, a spirit of forgiveness which never fails. With the active virtues, with an intrepidity that quails before none, however high in station and public esteem, there are connected the passive virtues of patience, forbearance, meekness. The world beholds in Jesus its ideal of goodness.¹

Now, there are conclusive reasons for affirming that this character is not the product of the imagination of the Evangelists. It is an original character, and one which those who describe it could never have invented. In the first place, it stands out in bold relief and in obvious contrast with the imperfections of those to whom we owe the portrait of it. With no model in actual life to follow, how could the fishermen of Galilee put on the canvas this figure—the central figure in the world's history? In the second place, it is not a character which is formally delineated. It is not set forth in a string of epithets, or abstract statements, or by vague, indiscriminate laudation. The impression which we gain of the character of Jesus is from a large collection of incidents and of sayings recorded in the Gospels. Our idea of him is the effect of a great variety of

The portraiture of Jesus not contrived.

¹ Speculative opinions not accordant with the faith of the Church have not availed to prevent candid minds from clearly discerning this fact. "It was reserved for Christianity to present to the world an ideal character, which through all the changes of eighteen centuries has inspired the hearts of men with an impassioned love, has shown itself capable of acting on all nations, ages, temperaments, and conditions, has been not only the highest pattern of virtue but the strongest incentive to its practice, and has exercised so deep an influence that it may be truly said that the simple record of three short years of active life has done more to regenerate and soften mankind than all the disquisitions of philosophers and all the exhortations of moralists."—Locky's History of European Morals, vol. ii, p. 9.

facts. To the production of such an effect by such means, the writers, had they drawn upon their own imagination, or that of others, would have been manifestly incompetent. Finally, the character of Jesus, as portrayed in the Gospels, has an unmistakable air of reality.

We may go forward with safety a step farther. Jesus, as we become acquainted with him in the Gospel narratives, which are to this extent self-verifying, was literally a sinless person. We have here a character of immaculate purity. This, to be sure, is a point which cannot be demonstrated, since no one can discern the motives of action; but it can be established beyond reasonable doubt. In all that is recorded of him, there is no evidence of moral fault. There is nothing that he did or said which can justly be made a ground of reproach. It is incredible that the Evangelists, even on the supposition of a plan on their part to make him out to be better than he was, could have selected their materials—putting in this, and leaving out that—in such a way as to accomplish the purpose. The task would have been too great for their powers. It would imply not only a perfect ideal in their minds, but, also, an impossible skill in realizing it in a narrative form.

Moreover, while Jesus was obviously holy beyond all example, and had the clearest, most penetrating discernment of moral evil, and

Perfection of the character of Jesus.

No self-reproach.

while he condemned even the least wrong in the inmost thoughts and intents of the soul, there is not a trace of self-reproach on his part. Had he anywhere, even in his prayers to God, implied that he was guilty of fault, some record of his self-accusation would have been left. It would have found its way into the traditions concerning him. When his cause was prostrate, and nothing but an ignominious death awaited him, in the hours of anguish some expression implying penitence would have escaped him. Not only is there no trace of such a feeling on his part, but it will scarcely be denied that he made on his followers, who were intimately associated with him, the impression that he was absolutely free from moral fault.

Those who are convinced that Jesus was without sin may find in the fact a cogent argument for the supernatural origin of Christianity. In the first place, there is no reason to think that any other faultless and perfect character has ever existed among men. Jesus is thus an exception to a universal fact respecting the race. To account for this exception, to explain this one instance of spotless purity, it is reasonable to assume an extraordinary relation to God on his part—to assume something that is equivalent to a miracle. In the second place, his sinlessness gives credibility to his testimony respecting himself. That he claimed to be the Son of God, the Messiah, is beyond all dispute. On this charge he was crucified. It will not be questioned that the position which he claimed, and persisted in claiming, was of an exceptional and exalted kind. It will not be questioned that he considered himself the spiritual guide and deliverer of mankind. To acquit him of an unheard-of arrogance and self-deception we must give credit to his judgment and testimony concerning himself. If we discredit this judgment and testimony we must conclude that perfect moral purity, and humility withal, are consistent with a self-exaltation alike baseless and really without a parallel in the extent to which it was carried. We must ascribe to him an enormous self-delusion. We must conclude of the only pure and perfect one that the light that was in him was "darkness."

The perfection of Jesus a miraculous fact.

The safeguard against self-deception.

CHAPTER VI.

PROOF OF THE MIRACLES FROM PECULIAR FEATURES OF THE GOSPEL NARRATIVES.

No one doubts that the Gospels contain a great deal that is true about the life and teaching of Christ. These books are the almost exclusive source from which the world derives its knowledge of what he did and suffered and of what he said. Such writers as Strauss and Rénan, who disbelieve in the miracles, construct biographies of Jesus out of the materials furnished them in the Gospels.

Now, before inquiring into the date and authorship of these four histories, we can find in what all candid students must concede to be historically true in them, convincing proof that miracles were wrought by Jesus.

1. On different occasions Jesus is said to have told those whom he miraculously healed not to make it publicly known.¹ He wished to avoid a public excitement having little or no kinship with moral and spiritual

The prohibitions to report miracles.

¹ Matt. ix. 30, xii. 16, xvii. 9; Mark iii. 12, v. 43; Luke v. 14, viii. 56, etc.

feeling. Sometimes he had to retire to solitary places to avoid the multitude. No one can reasonably question that these injunctions not to report miracles were uttered by him. There is no motive that could account for the invention of them, especially since it is added that they were disregarded.

2. Cautions, which are plainly authentic, against an excessive esteem of miracles, are said to have been uttered by Jesus.¹ No one who made up stories of miracles would connect with his accounts a disparagement of them, or anything that looked like it. The imaginative, wonder-loving spirit, which prompts to the invention of fictitious miracles, always magnifies their importance. The disciples, when they rejoiced that they had been able to deliver demoniacs, were told not to rejoice that the spirits were subject to them, but rather to rejoice that they could look forward to an abode in heaven.²

3. There are sayings of Christ which are evidently genuine, but which are inseparable from the miracles with which they are connected in the record. Thus, John the Baptist, when he was in prison, sent two of his disciples to Jesus to inquire if he were in truth the Messiah or only a forerunner.³ This inquiry implies a momentary doubt in the mind of John, owing, it is to be

Miracles not overvalued.

Teaching and miracles linked together.

¹ John iv. 48, xiv. 11; Matt. xvi. 3; Luke x. 17.

² Luke x. 20.

³ Matt. xi. 4; Luke xvii. 22.

presumed, to the fact that no grand demonstration of the power of Christ had been made, no visible establishment of a kingdom. Perhaps the gloom of a prison may have had its influence in exciting this transient doubt. But such a doubt in the mind of the prophet, of him whose testimony to Jesus was counted of so much value, no disciple of Jesus would have wished to occur. No one would think of falsely attributing it to John. The messengers were directed to go back to John and to tell him what they had seen and heard: "The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk; the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear; the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them." This answer of Jesus is part and parcel of the incident. It is inseparable from the question. And the incident proves that Jesus was engaged in working the miracles of which mention is made.

Among the controversies of Jesus with over-rigid observers of the sabbath, there is one in which he is said to have put the question: "Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the sabbath day?"¹ These words are in a style characteristic of Jesus. Few, if any, doubt that he uttered them. Now, Luke says that the occasion of the question was a reproach from the Pharisees for healing a man of the dropsy. The words obviously imply that it was a case where some one who was in extreme danger had been rescued. How can it be doubted that Jesus had really, as the Evangelist relates, healed a man of a dangerous disease on the sabbath day?

¹ Luke xiv. 5.

Other similar instances might be adduced. One who studies the Gospels will see that the teachings of Jesus presuppose the miracles which are recorded in conjunction with his reported words having reference to them.

The Evangelists ascribe to Jesus no miracles prior to his baptism. This is one striking difference between them and the apocryphal Gospels. If the record of miracles by the Evangelists is not true, if they are creations of fancy or invention, why do they not commence earlier? Why are not miracles ascribed to Jesus before he reached the age of thirty? Why is this long period left a blank?

Moreover, no miracles are attributed to John the Baptist, notwithstanding that so much value is attached in the Gospels to his testimony to Jesus. If there had been a disposition to make up stories of miracles that did not occur, why is not John credited with works of a like nature?

No miracles
prior to the baptism of Jesus.

No miracles ascribed to the Baptist.

CHAPTER VII.

PROOF OF THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS FROM STATEMENTS BY THE APOSTLE PAUL.

There are four Epistles which no competent scholar doubts that the Apostle Paul wrote. The most noted schools of modern skeptics have with one accord accepted them as genuine. They are the two Epistles to the Corinthians, and the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians. In his first Epistle to the Corinthians, Paul refers to the proofs of the resurrection of Jesus. In this important passage we are told what he had learned from the other Apostles on this subject. In the Epistle to the Galatians he speaks of his intercourse with them on different occasions. Three years after his conversion, he had spent a fortnight with Peter at Jerusalem (Gal. i. 18). At that time he had met James, the Lord's brother. Later (A.D. 52), he met Peter, James, and John, and conferred with them on the Gospel (Gal. ii. 1-10). He had enjoyed ample opportunities to ascertain what the Apostles had to say about the resurrection of Jesus; that he would avail himself of these

The acquaintance of Paul with the other Apostles.

opportunities we might be certain beforehand; but that he did so, what he tells us on the subject proves.

Writing to the Corinthians, he sets down distinctly what he had previously declared to them respecting the Saviour's reappearance from the dead.¹ On the third day after his burial, Jesus appeared to Peter. Afterwards he appeared to the twelve; then to above five hundred brethren assembled together; then to James; then to all the Apostles. Last of all, he had manifested himself alive to Paul himself at the time of his conversion; for to this event he undoubtedly refers. Even without the records of the Evangelists, it is safe to conclude, from these statements in the Epistle to the Corinthians, that the Apostles, from the third day after the death of Jesus, testified, substantially as related by Paul, to his resurrection. We have, therefore, the testimony of the Apostles to this cardinal fact in the Gospel history, and that testimony is entitled to credit.

It is said, by way of objection, that the alleged manifestation of Jesus to Paul was in a vision, and that this may have been unreal. But, first, Paul distinguishes the first revelation of Jesus to him, when he saw Jesus, from subsequent visions and revelations (2 Cor. xii. 1; 1 Cor. ii. 10). "Last of all," he says, enumerating the

What he had learned from them.

Paul saw
Jesus.

¹ 1 Cor. xv. 1-9.

appearances of the risen Jesus, "he appeared to me also." Whether by "all" is here meant all interviews with the risen Jesus, or all of the Apostles, the inference following from the statement is the same. Paul's sight of Jesus at his conversion was the last of the series of his bodily manifestations, as distinguished from apocalyptic visions. Secondly, even if there were any reason to regard these last as unreal, his first perception of Christ could not be accounted for in this way. We shall show hereafter that Paul's mind was not in such a state as to permit us to ascribe that first revelation to him to the effect of hallucination. We shall find him assuring us that he had not felt the least doubt as to the rectitude of the course that he was pursuing in his warfare on the disciples. He had not the slightest misgivings on the subject. The expression: "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks," is a proverb denoting the futility of the attempt to withstand the progress of Christ's cause. It has no reference to inward feelings of Paul, as if he were disturbed by doubt and a divided mind. He verily thought that he was doing God service.

Whatever the nature of the alleged manifestation of Jesus to Paul was, there is no reason to interpret him as saying that the appearances of Jesus to the other Apostles were of the same kind as to him. If we turn to the Gospels, we find accounts of interviews of the risen Jesus with his followers, which, to say the least, are the earliest and the only traditions that were handed down in the early Church. This can be safely affirmed before we examine the question of the authorship of the Gospels. There is certainly, even at this stage of our discussion, no reason to doubt that these accounts in the Gospels embody the statements which the Apostles made to their converts. At all events, Paul's letter to the Corinthians establishes the point that they testified to the interviews which he there enumerates.

Were the Apostles deceived? Were these manifestations to them (and to the five hundred) a delusion of their own minds? The hallucination theory. Hallucination is a disorder of the senses, or of the brain, which leads one to see or to hear what has no reality outside of the nervous organism. This explanation of the appearances of Jesus to the Disciples after his death, is excluded for several reasons that are decisive. There is no probability that they were looking for any such reappearance of Christ. There is no reason to distrust, but good reasons for believing, the statements of the Evangelists that the disciples, although they did not disperse, or forsake Jerusalem, were affected with sorrow and fear. This would be natural on finding themselves bereaved of their Master, and their hopes connected with him crushed by an event so appalling as his crucifixion. There was, then, no preparation of mind for such a delusion as the hallucination theory implies. Then, the fact that so many persons, in companies, on different occasions, were persuaded, without a shadow of doubt, that Christ was with them, and that they saw him, renders such an hypothesis the more improbable. When the authenticity of the Gospels shall have been established, the circumstances related by them—for example, the doubts of Thomas and the way they were overcome—will be seen absolutely to preclude the theory in question. But, besides these considerations, the idea of hallucination is shut out by one remarkable peculiarity of the alleged manifestations of the risen Jesus. They took place, as Paul's testimony shows, at intervals, and in a definite number. They began at a certain time—on the third day; and they ended after a brief period. Had the followers of Jesus been in that state of mind out of which the illusions of hallucination might arise, and if this had been the source of what they thought to be actual reappearances of Jesus, these manifestations would have been much more numerous. They would not have begun and ended at these definite points. They would not have suddenly ceased. They would have continued and multiplied as time went on, and as the courage and enthusiasm of the flock increased. This would surely have been the case, according to the ordinary law of the working of this sort of mental delusion.

The conclusion is justified that the testimony of the Apostles, to which they adhered at the cost of every earthly comfort and of life itself—for there is no doubt that they steadfastly endured these penalties—ought to be believed.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE GENUINENESS OF THE GOSPELS.

The evidence of the genuineness of the Gospels is the same in kind as the evidence which satisfies us of the genuineness of the History of the Jews (ascribed to Josephus), of Livy's History of Rome, and of other writings, whether ancient or modern. The early reception of writings as genuine by those who had the means of knowing, early traditions respecting them which are not justly liable to suspicion, references to them, or quotations from them, at a time when, if they were spurious, this fact could not have been concealed, internal marks in the works themselves indicative of their authorship or date of composition—these are among the proofs on which we rely in determining the question of the origin of literary works.

In glancing at the evidence on this subject, in the present case, we will first take our stand in the closing part of the second century. It is allowed on all hands that the four Gospels of the canon were at that time the sole and universally recognized authorities concerning the life of Jesus, in all the churches in the different regions of the Roman Empire. From this starting-point we will travel backward to the immediate neighborhood of the Apostolic age.

One of the most famous and influential men in the Church in the last quarter of the second century was Irenæus, who became bishop of Lyons, in Gaul, A.D. 177. Not far from A.D. 180 he wrote an elaborate work against the heresies which had sprung up in that century. In the course of this work he has occasion to speak of the Four Gospels as received by all the churches, and received exclusively. He does not speak of this fact as anything new, or as if he had ever heard of anything different, or as if there could be any reasonable doubt that this exclusive rank belonged to the Four. According to Irenæus, one might as well think of more or less than four quarters of the earth, of more or less than the four winds. He tells us, moreover, in detail,¹ that Matthew published "a written Gospel among the Hebrews in their own language," that after the death of Peter and Paul, "Mark, Peter's disciple and interpreter, did himself also publish unto us in writing the things which were preached by Peter"; that "Luke, too, the attendant of Paul, set down in a book the Gospel preached by him"; that "afterwards John, the disciple of the Lord, who also leaned on his breast—he again put forth his Gospel while he abode in Ephesus in Asia." Elsewhere,¹ Irenæus informs us that John lived to an advanced age, and did not die until after the accession of Trajan (A.D. 98).

¹ Adv. Haer., III., i., 1.

Of the integrity of Irenæus there is no question. We have only to ascertain what means he had of acquainting himself with the past. He was born in Asia Minor, and spent the early part of his life in the East. He well remembered Polycarp, the martyr, Bishop of Smyrna, who was an acquaintance and disciple of the Apostle John himself.² Polycarp was put to death A.D. 155. How long it was before his death that Irenæus had intercourse with him we are not told, but it was when Irenæus himself was young. He was probably born between A.D. 120 and A.D. 130. Besides the memorable fact of his acquaintance with Polycarp, Irenæus was familiar with many Christian disciples who were old when he was a youth. Pothinus, whose colleague he was for a while at Lyons, before he succeeded him as bishop, lived to the age of ninety years. He died A.D. 177. Irenæus had conferred with "elders"—that is, venerated leaders in the Church of an earlier time, who had been pupils of men whom the Apostles had instructed, and some of whom had sat at the feet of the Apostles themselves.³

¹ Adv. Haer., II., xxii., 5.

² Adv. Haer., III., iii., 4; Epist. ad Flor.

³ Adv. Haer., II., xxii., 5; III., i., 1; III., iii., 4; V., xxx., 1; IV., xxxii., 1; cf. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., III., 23; IV., 14; V., 8.

A like testimony to the universal exclusive reception of the Four Gospels, as the authorities handed down in the churches, is given by other distinguished church teachers, contemporaries of Irenæus. We hear substantially the same thing from Clement, a renowned theological teacher at Alexandria, and from Tertullian, who was a leading presbyter in North Africa. Clement was born not later than A.D. 160. Referring to a statement in an apocryphal Gospel, he remarks that it is not found "in the four Gospels which have been handed down to us."¹ Clement was a man of learning who had, moreover, travelled extensively. The four Gospels, Tertullian asserts, have existed from "the very beginning," and "are coeval with the churches themselves."² His appeal is to the testimony of churches which the Apostles themselves founded.

We now go back to the generation prior to Irenæus. Here we have the testimony of Justin Martyr. Justin was put to death for being a Christian, under Marcus Aurelius, probably A.D. 166. At the time of the Jewish rebellion of Bar-cochba (A.D. 134-136), he had already pursued extensive studies in various schools of philosophy, and had been converted to the Christian faith. He was born, it is believed, at the close of the first century. His birthplace was the Roman colony of Flavia Neapolis, near the ancient Sichem, in Samaria; but his family was Greek. He sojourned for a time at Ephesus. He had a wide acquaintance with Christians, and with their churches in many places. Three of his writings are extant—two “Apologies,” or Defences of Christianity, and the Dialogue with Trypho, a Jew. The first of his Apologies was addressed to Antoninus Pius, about 148; the second followed not long after the first. The sources from which Justin draws his accounts of the life and teachings of Jesus he styles Memoirs, or Memoirs of the Apostles. Writing for disbelievers outside of the Church, he has no occasion to refer to the authors of them by name. But he describes them as written by Apostles and their companions. This he does in connection with a passage that is found in Luke.¹ This description answers to the Four, two of whom bear the names of Apostles, and the other two were ascribed to attendants of Apostles. In one place he refers to an incident respecting Peter, which he professes to derive from “his Gospel.”² The incident is found in Mark, which, as we know from other sources, was not unfrequently called Peter’s Gospel. Another reading of the text in Justin, however, would make the reference to be, as in other places, to the Memoirs of “the Apostles.” He calls the Memoirs, in one place, "Gospels."¹ Twice he refers to "the Gospel,"² a title given in other authors to the Four collectively. Justin says that the Memoirs were in public use. They were read on Sunday in the religious services of Christians, "in city and country."³ What were these "Memoirs"? They must have been the same as those described by Irenæus. If not, it must be assumed that after Irenæus had grown up to manhood, the authoritative Gospels in use in the Churches were superseded by others, or else that new Gospels, not previously acknowledged, took their place by the side of such as had previously been accepted. But how could so important changes take place, and Irenæus know nothing of them?

¹ Strom., III., 553 (ed. Potter).

² Adv. Marcion, IV., 5.

¹ Dial. c. 103.² Dial., c. 108.

But the references to the contents of the Memoirs in Justin are very numerous. When they are brought together they make up a pretty full account of the events in the life of Jesus, and of his sayings. They correspond to the statements of the canonical Evangelists. A large part of the matter accords with what we find in Matthew and Luke; a small portion of it is found in Mark alone; and there are not wanting striking correspondences to passages occurring exclusively in John. It is true that the quotations are not verbally accurate. For Justin's purpose there was no occasion that they

Correspondence of the quotations to the Gospels of the Canon.

¹ Apol., I., c. 66.

² Dial., cc. 10, 100.

³ Apol., I. 67.

should be. But his quotations from the Gospels are not more free, as to their form, than are his references to Old Testament passages. He does not even think it necessary to cite a passage the second time in the same words. His verbal inaccuracy in quoting John (John iii. 3-5) was a natural one, and has been shown to be just the same as in a citation of the passage in so late a writer as the celebrated English divine, Jeremy Taylor.¹ Justin's references to events or sayings in the Gospel history, which have not substantial parallels in the Gospels of the Canon, are few and insignificant, and can be accounted for without supposing them to have been derived from other written sources. They embrace not more than two sayings of Jesus, both of which are found in other writers who yet own no authoritative Gospels but the four of the Canon.

An additional proof that Justin's Gospels were the four of the Canon is the fact that Tatian, who was a pupil of Justin, combined these four in a simple narrative, called Diatesseron, or the Gospel of the Four. It began with the opening passage of John's Gospel.

Tatian's
harmony.

¹ Justin's words are: "For, indeed, Christ also said 'except ye be born again, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.' And that it is impossible for those who are once born to enter into their mothers' womb is plain to all." Not alone by the correspondence of passages in Justin with particular verses in John, is his use of this Gospel made evident. His teaching in respect to the Logos or Word must have been derived from a source recognized as authoritative; and no such source is known, unless it was the Fourth Gospel.

The Christian literature prior to the middle of the second century is scanty in amount, and fragmentary. It consists for the most part of letters, written for purposes of edification. Statements coincident with passages in the Gospels occur, but they are usually interwoven in the text, either without any express notice that they are quoted, or with an indefinite mention of them as being a part of authoritative Christian teaching. It is not always possible to tell with certainty whether such passages were taken from the oral tradition at the basis of the first three Gospels, or from these writings themselves. But we meet in the Apostolic Fathers, the writers of the sub-apostolic age, numerous echoes of the narratives which make up the contents of the four canonical Gospels.

Character of the earliest literature.

A few instances may be given of this character. Polycarp, in his Epistle to the Philippians,¹ has the words: "According as the Lord said, 'the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.'" The quotation corresponds exactly to Matt. vi. 13, and was probably derived from this Gospel. In the same chapter, Polycarp says: "For every one who shall not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is antichrist." This statement was taken from 1 John iv. 2-4, unless indeed it was remembered by Polycarp as having been uttered by his apostolic teacher. Without doubt, the Gospel of John and the first Epistle are from the same hand. The Epistle erroneously ascribed to Barnabas was written not later than A.D. 120. It contains several passages which it is most natural to refer to the Gospel of Matthew as their source. This appears almost certain respecting the passage, "He came not to call the righteous but sinners."¹ In another place it is said: "Let us take heed lest so be that we be found, as it is written, 'Many called, but few chosen.'"² The words quoted are identical with Matt. xx. 16, or xxii. 14. The preface—"it is written"—was the common prefix to citations from sacred Scripture. If it have this meaning here, the Gospel is placed on a level with the books of the Old Testament.

Polycarp.

¹ C. vii.

A very ancient document, called "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," was first published in 1883, a few years after its discovery in a library in Constantinople. It is held by some scholars to be older than the Epistle of Barnabas (A.D. 120), and even to be as early as the last years of the first century. If not so old as Barnabas, we are forbidden by internal marks from placing it later than A.D. 140. It is a kind of Church manual of instruction, characterized by a strong infusion of Jewish Christian peculiarities. This book contains passages which imply a use of the Gospels of Matthew and of Luke. In one place³ it

Epistle of Barnabas.

Teaching of the XII. Apostles.

¹ C. v. 9; cf. Matt. ix. 13.

² C. iv. 9.

³ C. xv.

says: "But your prayers and your alms and all your deeds so do ye, as ye have it in the Gospel of our Lord." The same word—the Greek for "Gospel"—occurs in three other places in the book. It is probable that the term denotes a written record. It is the name given in Origen and other early writers to the Four Gospels, taken collectively, or regarded as one body. As used in the Teaching, it may have the same meaning; or it may possibly designate a combination, or harmony, of Matthew and Luke, which was in the author's hands. The writings which are thus tacitly recognized in the Teaching must have been received as authorities in the churches for which it was written, and in which it was used. Besides the distinct traces of the use of these Gospels, the three Eucharistic prayers¹ contain words and phrases peculiar to John's Gospel. From this source it is natural to conclude that they were drawn.

The antiquity of the Gospels is proved by the ancient versions that were made. The Peshito, the Bible of the Syrian churches, originated, in all probability within the limits of the second century. Its origin is placed by the most competent scholars in the first half of that century. The Old Latin version was in current use when Tertullian wrote. It must have been made earlier than A.D. 170; how much earlier we cannot determine.

The ancient versions.

¹ Cc. ix. and x.

From a contemporary of Justin, but older than he—Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia—we have definite accounts relative to the composition of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. Papias was a contemporary of Polycarp (who was born A. D. 69 and died, as we have said, in 155). Papias was diligent in gathering information from those who had been conversant with the Apostles, and he appears to have conferred personally with two of the immediate disciples of Jesus, John, the Elder (as he is called), and Aristion. He was thought by Irenæus to have been acquainted with John, the Apostle, but this is doubted by the ancient church historian, Eusebius. Papias wrote a book entitled, “Exposition of the Oracles of the Lord.” In this work, he says of John, the Elder, or Presbyter, in a passage quoted by Eusebius :

“And the Elder said this: “Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately what he remembered, not, however, recording in order what was either said or done by Christ. For neither did he hear the Lord nor follow Him, but afterwards, as I have said, attended Peter,” etc.

“Such,” adds Eusebius, “is the relation in Papias concerning Mark. But concerning Matthew this is said: ‘So then Matthew wrote the oracles in the Hebrew language, and everyone interpreted them as he was able.’”¹

¹ Euseb., Hist. Eccl., iv., 30.

The language of Papias implies that the necessity of translating the Hebrew or Aramaic original of Matthew no longer existed. That is to say, Matthew in the Greek was in his hands. Some scholars are of opinion that the word for "oracles" in the foregoing extracts from Papias, should be rendered "discourses" or "sayings," and that the work which Matthew wrote in Aramaic consisted mostly of discourses of Jesus. To these, it is supposed, the narrative parts of the book were added, in connection with its translation into Greek. Whatever expansion the writing of Matthew may have received after it was first composed, the work was so far recognized as his production that it continued to bear his name. That it existed in its present form as early as the capture of Jerusalem by Titus (A. D. 70) will be proved hereafter from internal evidence. If any portion of the book had another author than Matthew, that author was a contemporary disciple of sufficient authority to secure an undisputed acceptance of what was thus connected with the Apostle's composition. This editor of Matthew would stand thus on a level with Mark and Luke.

A striking proof of the genuineness of the canonical Gospels is the use made of them by heretical Marcion, leaders, by whom they are dealt with as having authority in the churches. From these Gospels they endeavor to draw support for their eccentric opinions. In behalf of the third Gospel there is evidence of a peculiar character from the treatment of it by Marcion, the founder of a sect bearing his name. Marcion was an active and formidable heresiarch when Justin wrote his first Apology (A.D. 148). He was born in Pontus, in Asia Minor; he knew Polycarp; and he was in Rome as early as about A.D. 140. Owing to his one-sided zeal for Paul's doctrine, as he incorrectly understood it, he refused to acknowledge the other Apostles as authorized guides, and made up a Canon, or collection of Scriptures, out of Paul's Epistles, and the Gospel of Luke—striking out of Luke, however, passages which recognized the authority of the Old Testament law. The Gospel used by Marcion is demonstrated, and is now generally conceded, to have been a mutilated Luke. This mutilation of the third Gospel, in order to promote a sectarian purpose, and the whole proceeding of Marcion in the matter, make it clear that Luke's Gospel, as we have it, was at the time generally received in the churches. Marcion selected this Gospel for the reason that Luke was acknowledged to have been a disciple of Paul. It is a just inference that the canonical Gospel was an authoritative document in the churches when a considerable number of the younger contemporaries of the Apostles were still living.

Within the first three Gospels themselves there are distinct evidences of their early date, and whatever proves their early date, proves likewise their genuineness; since, in the lifetime of the Apostles, and under their eyes, forged compositions, had anybody wished or dared to frame them, could not have secured acceptance among those whom the Apostles guided and taught. The most convincing of these internal proofs is in the predictive passages respecting the destruction of Jerusalem and the Parousia, or Second Advent, of Christ. The first impression made by these passages in Matthew is that there was no time to intervene between the two events, and the impression made by the corresponding passages in Mark and in Luke is that the interval is to be brief. It is not requisite here to attempt to explain the passages in question, or to account for the peculiarity to which we allude. Whatever explanation is adopted, it remains evident that, had the Gospels been written at a later day, the association of the destruction of Jerusalem with the last Judgment, in the manner and form in which they appear to be connected by the Evangelists, especially in Matthew, would not exist. There would surely have been some explanation, some caution against so natural an inference, some indication that the two events were not to stand in so close juxtaposition. Whoever will candidly examine the passages referred to, will be persuaded that the first three Gospels were written before the generation that

Internal proof of the early date of the first three Gospels.

listened to Jesus had passed off the stage. Matthew was composed before Jerusalem was taken by Titus. In any revision of this Gospel later than the catastrophe, these perplexing passages would not have been left unexplained. Mark must likewise have preceded the capture of the city and the destruction of the temple; and Luke must have been written, if not before, within a short time after these momentous occurrences.

The first three Gospels—and the same will be found to be true of the fourth—abound in allusions to places, local customs, characteristic ideas and feelings, such as no counterfeiter, writing at a later day, could have wrought into the narratives. They are introduced without design. They are such as only contemporaries familiar with Palestine and the ways of the people could have been conversant with. Very rarely there may occur a reference of this sort which it is difficult to verify; but this is true of the best accredited ancient writers who have left us accounts of their own times. The atmosphere of the Gospels is that of Galilee and Judea in the days of the Apostles.

The third Gospel and the book of Acts were ascribed without dispute, in the ancient Church, to Luke, a companion of Paul—the same Luke who is referred to by the Apostle.¹ Both works are undeniably by the same

Local references.

Internal proof of the genuineness of Luke.

¹ Col. iv. 16; ² Tim. iv. 11.

author. This is manifest from the style. The book of Acts refers to "the former treatise," which was also addressed to the same Theophilus to whom the Acts is inscribed.¹ The author of the third Gospel professes to have derived his information from careful inquiries made of immediate witnesses and participants in the events related.² He had learned the facts orally, or, it might be, in part from writings. His avowed purpose was to present an accurate, consecutive narrative. There is no reason for questioning the fact that this statement was made by the author of the Gospel, or for doubting its truth. That the author was really at times a companion of Paul is established by a peculiar, convincing piece of evidence.

Its author an attendant of Paul.

The narrative in Acts moves on as we should expect of a historian who has gathered his information from others, until he arrives at Troas.³ Then there is a sudden transition to the first person plural—"immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia." The use of the pronoun, implying the author's personal association with Paul, goes on until the Apostle reaches Philippi. Then it is dropped during the rest of the Apostle's second missionary journey. But he joins Paul again, it would appear, at Philippi,⁴ and continues in his company all the way to Rome. The graphic description of the voyage and shipwreck

¹ Acts i. 1; Luke i. 4.

³ Acts xvii. 10.

² Luke i. 3.

⁴ Acts xx. 5.

makes it almost impossible to doubt that it was written by one who saw what he relates. There is no reasonable explanation of this use of the pronoun "we" in these parts of the book except that the author of the Acts (and thus the author of the third Gospel) accompanied Paul for a time on his journey. The style of the "we" passages is in complete accord with that of the rest of the book. This of itself excludes the idea that they are quoted from a document not written by the author. We cannot attribute to him a purpose to deceive the reader on this point. Had he been capable of such a fraudulent intent he would have taken pains to make his pretended relation to Paul more conspicuous. He would not have left it to be detected and inferred by none but observing readers. This is not at all the manner of the framers of pseudonymous writings.

It has been alleged that the representation of the relation of Paul to the other leading Apostles, which is given in the Acts, and of Paul's teaching to others, is not consistent with what we learn from his Epistles. This charge applies especially to Acts xv., and to the account there of the conference at Jerusalem. The allegation is that there was hostility to Paul and his doctrine, on the part of Peter. This objection would imply that the author of the Acts, whoever he may have been, was a later writer and a deliberate deceiver. It is overthrown completely by Paul's own un-

Agreement of Acts with the statements of Paul.

equivocal statement that the other Apostles—Peter, James, and John—“added nothing” to him; that is, had nothing to add, by way of amendment, to his doctrine—and by his distinct assertion that they gave to him “the right hand of fellowship.”¹ This disproves the notion that Peter was a judaizer. That there was a public conference is not excluded, but rather implied in Paul’s language.² That the results of it were substantially as are related in the Acts, admits of no reasonable doubt. James, and those of like mind with him, would not have been content with a less measure of accommodation to Jewish feeling, from the side of the Gentile converts. That they were content is established by Paul’s testimony in the Galatians.

The fourth Gospel is distinguished by marked characteristics from the other three. It has a more full account of the labors of Jesus in Judea.

The fourth Gospel and the first three.

According to the fourth Gospel his ministry extended over more than three years; whereas from the first three—looked at apart from the light thrown on them by the fourth—we should infer that it was limited to about one year. The style of the discourses in John differs from that of most of the sayings of Jesus recorded in the other Evangelists. But these differences do not amount to an inconsistency. As to the labors of Jesus in Judea, and the duration of his ministry, we find in the other Gospels incidental corroboration of the statements in John.¹ We find in them, also, occasional utterances of Jesus in the same vein as that of the discourses in the fourth Gospel.² The language ascribed to Jesus, as far as it is like that of the Evangelist himself, and of other persons who appear in his narrative, may be accounted for naturally, if we suppose that John had assimilated the thoughts of his master, and presents them, in part, in a condensed form and in language of his own.

¹ Gal. ii. 6, 9.

² Gal. ii. 2.

Peculiarities of the fourth Gospel prove its genuineness. These peculiarities of the fourth Gospel are really an argument for its genuineness, for they are such as no forger, no one falsely assuming to be an Apostle, would have ventured to impart to his composition. He would rather have sought to imitate, as far as he could, the earlier, acknowledged, and well-known Gospels. Having these striking peculiarities, it would have been suspected and rejected on the ground of them, had not the churches and church teachers had good evidence that an Apostle wrote it. But we discover that the fourth Gospel was received in the second century without question or contradiction. The only exception is the opposition to it of a handful of so-called "Alogi," at Thyatira, about A.D. 170, who disliked it primarily on doctrinal grounds. But even this handful of sectaries, by ascribing it to Cerinthus, a contemporary of John, the Apostle, at Ephesus, and an opponent, refuted themselves, since their assertion implied its early date, and since the acceptance by the church of Ephesus, and of the other churches in Asia Minor and elsewhere, of a Gospel which was the work of a notorious heretic, is incredible. To the testimony of Irenæus, and to the decisive character of it, in view of his relations to Polycarp and to others in that very region, we have already adverted.¹

The Alogi.

¹ For example, in Matt. xxiii. 37.

² For example, Matt. xi. 27 (Luke x. 22).

The fourth Gospel was written by a Palestinian Jew. This is shown, among other proofs, by peculiarities of language. Moreover, the Gospel is strewn with references to local peculiarities which prove the author to have been well acquainted with the scenes of the narrative. This characteristic has been admitted by prominent critics of the skeptical schools. Rénan says of the account of the healing of the nobleman's son in the fifth chapter, that it was written by one who had himself made the journey from Cana to Capernaum. Irenæus could not have been deceived in his recollections of what he had heard from Polycarp, a disciple of John, nor could he have been mistaken as to the person to whom Polycarp referred, and reminiscences of whom he was fond of relating. In the circle in the midst of which Polycarp was held in honor, and of which Irenæus, in his youth, was a member, there was no doubt or dispute respecting the authorship and date of the fourth Gospel.

Local references.

¹ Page 48, seq.

The manner in which the authorship of the fourth Gospel is disclosed in the work itself contains a strong proof of its genuineness.

The author of the fourth Gospel—his disclosure of himself.

This disclosure of himself by the author stands in connection with an attestation appended to the book at the close. In the course of the narrative, a disciple is referred to repeatedly, but with an avoidance of the mention of his name. There leaned on the bosom of Jesus at the Last Supper “one of his disciples whom Jesus loved.”¹ There went with Peter to the tomb of Jesus “the other disciple, whom Jesus loved.”² He is spoken of as “another disciple,” and “that other disciple.” It will not be doubted that he was the “one of the two” who with Andrew followed Jesus to his abode.³ It is said that on the second day after the baptism of Jesus, he and Andrew were standing with John the Baptist, whose disciples they were. They heard what John said of Jesus as he walked by, and followed him. Jesus turned, and asked them what they were seeking. They inquired where his abode was. He invited them to come and see. It was four o’clock, we are told, when they joined him, and they spent with him the remainder of the afternoon. That this anonymous disciple was John, or that he is the person designated in these expressions, is not questioned. The "other disciple" was not Peter, for Peter is mentioned as an associate. No one has imagined it to be James, the brother of John, who died early in the Apostolic age.¹ Of the three who are known to have been most intimate with Jesus, only John is left. Now this covert method of revealing the author could only spring from a certain delicacy of feeling on his part, which prevented him from giving his own name, especially since he was led to speak of himself as standing in so tender a relation to Jesus. A forger, a writer pretending to be John, would never have resorted to this peculiar mode of indicating who he was, or professed to be. It is utterly contrary to the style characteristic of spurious writings.

¹ xiii. 23.

² xx. 2.

³ i. 39.

At the end of the Gospel there is an attestation which has been connected with it, in all probability, since its first publication. It reads as follows: "This is the disciple which beareth witness of these things, and wrote these things; and we know that his witness is true."² According to the ancient tradition, the Gospel was published by the disciples of John at Ephesus, after his death. This, then, is the indorsement which comes from those into whose custody it was given.

If any should imagine that the Gospel was com-

Testimony of John's disciples.

¹ Acts xii. 2.

² John xxi. 24 (Revised Version).

posed by these pupils of John, on the basis of what they had learned from him, the objections to this hypothesis are conclusive. First, it is contrary to the certification just quoted. Secondly, it is confuted by the manner in which the author modestly veils his own personality, instead of directly declaring himself.

The style of the first of the Epistles ascribed to John makes it evident that it was written by the same author as the fourth Gospel. In this Epistle we have an unequivocal declaration that the author of it was with Jesus and an eye-witness of what he did.¹

That the author was personally conversant with Jesus is distinctly implied in his use of the first person plural of the pronoun:² "We beheld his glory," etc. He plainly asserts that he saw water and blood flowing from the side of Jesus as he hung on the cross.³ If it was not so, we are obliged to impute to the author, whoever he was, wilful deception.

The fourth Gospel is a sort of autobiography, or personal confession of the faith of the writer in Jesus, and of how it grew up in his soul.

Personal intimacy implied.

It is steeped in personal affection, and pervaded by the atmosphere of personal loyalty and devotion. All this involves the fact of personal intimacy and discipleship.

It has been shown that the four Gospels were written by Apostles and well-informed contemporaries. Even if their authorship and date could not be definitely ascertained, there is good reason to believe that in their contents the story which the Apostles told of Jesus, his teaching and works, is fairly embodied. From Justin Martyr and other writers of the second century it is made plain that this and no other tradition existed on the subject. The opponents of Christianity knew of no other. One of the most acute of these was Celsus, who is supposed to have composed his attack about A.D. 180. From Origen's reply we can gather up a great portion of what Celsus wrote. Thus it is ascertained that the history of Jesus, which is the object of his adverse criticism, corresponds with what is narrated in the Gospels. Celsus knew of no other conception of Christ, and of his words and deeds.

¹ 1 John i. 1.

² John i. 14.

³ xix. 34.

Only one tradition.

Celsus.

CHAPTER IX.

TRUSTWORTHINESS OF THE TESTIMONY OF THE APOSTLES.

We have before us in the Gospels the testimony of the Apostles. We have the substance of what they declared to be the truth respecting the career of Jesus. The question now to be considered is whether the Apostles are entitled to credit. They are worthy of belief unless it can be shown either The alternative. that they intended to deceive, or were themselves mistaken. Were they impostors? Or, if not impostors, were they enthusiasts, incapable of discriminating between actual occurrences and their own imaginings? Were they knaves, or were they simpletons?

The Apostles understood that their office was that of witnesses. They were selected by Jesus to be with Conscious of being witnesses. him, to hear what he said and to see what he did. In a passage, the authenticity of which is not open to question,¹ Peter requires that one should be chosen to take the place of Judas, who had been with them and with Christ.

¹ Acts i. 21-25. The prominence here given to Peter by the author, a Pauline Christian, prevents even skeptical critics from calling in question the truth of the historical statement.

He must be qualified to bear witness to the resurrection of Jesus—a fact singled out as the most important in the Apostles' testimony.

The Apostles never ceased to feel that they were disciples. They stood in the position, not of originators, but of learners. Something un-
Always disciples. speakably precious had been communicated to them to be delivered to others. All their own hopes rested on the facts which they had nothing to do in originating.

They tell their tale in the dispassionate tone that belongs to truthful witnesses. They are content
Their tone. to let the simple facts speak for themselves. For example, there are no invectives against Judas. They go no further than just to relate what he did.

The candor of the Apostles, and of the Evangelists who were not of their number, is evident. A
Their candor. single instance will suffice as an example. Luke relates how Paul was set upon by a furious mob of Jews.¹ They shouted that he had brought Greeks into the temple, and had defiled that "holy place." The historian takes pains to state immediately a fact—one that he might have suppressed—which was of the nature of an excuse for their violence. They had seen, he tells us, one Trophimus, an Ephesian, with Paul, and had heard that he had taken him into the temple.

¹ Acts xxi. 27 seq.

They show their honesty in relating things discreditable to themselves. Peter told the story of his denials of the Master, for it is related by Mark as well as by the other Evangelists. The reproofs of Jesus are faithfully set down. The Apostles speak of their ambition and contentious rivalry, and of the way in which they were rebuked by Christ.¹ They relate how they failed to understand Jesus in cases where it seemed obtuse in them not to take in his meaning.² What better proof can there be of candor? They even tell how they all forsook him.³ It is evident that the Apostles had no thought of themselves, so absorbing was the interest which they felt in the scenes which they had beheld, and in which they had taken part, and in him to whom they looked up as to their lord and master. All personal considerations were lost in the magnitude of the events which had passed before their eyes.

The sincerity of the Apostles is proved by what they were willing to endure in consequence of the testimony which they gave. The Apostle Paul speaks of the Apostles collectively as "the off-scouring of all things."⁴ They had no selfish advantage to gain. On the contrary, the hatred of their friends, exile, personal indignities hard to bear, even torture and death, were the Relate things to their own discredit.

Their sincerity proved by their sufferings.

¹ Mark ix. 34; Luke ix. 46

² Matt. xv. 16, xvi. 6, 7, etc.

³ Matt. xxvi. 56; Mark xiv. 50.

⁴ 1 Cor. iv. 13.

reward which they had to expect for testifying to what they professed to have seen and heard.

The truth of the Gospel narratives is shown by a thousand incidental (and, therefore, undesigned) allusions to the topography, customs, and manners of the country—to peculiarities of time and place. These things, which prove their early date, confirm, also, their credibility.

Allusions to local customs.

That the Gospel narratives spring out of intentional deceit will not be seriously alleged. To account for them as far as they relate miracles, the "mythical theory" was proposed by Strauss. This theory was that groups of early believers in Jesus, brooding over Old Testament predictions of the Messiah and accounts of miracles wrought by the prophets, imagined that Jesus healed the sick, raised the dead, etc. These stories were an unconscious growth of fancy in secluded communities of Galilean followers of Jesus.

The mythical theory.

This theory is untenable. Where were the communities of Christians who were so far removed from the oversight of the Apostles? How could that childlike, unreflecting mood of feeling, required for the unconscious action of mythopœic fancy, arise or abide when the faith of Christian disciples was challenged at every turn, and when they were called upon to defend it against hostile criticism? How could those who thought that the Messiah must work miracles have been moved to believe in Jesus unless he actually met this indispensable condition? They felt that miracles there must be, we are told, and hence invented or dreamed out fictitious tales to fill the gap; and yet the lack of them had not stood in the way of their faith in the messianic claim of Jesus! The time between the death of Jesus and the composition of the Gospels was too short to admit of the rise of a body of myths, a spontaneous growth in the circles of believers. Moreover, the Gospels came not from secluded disciples, such as are imagined to have given birth to mythical tales. They came from the Apostles and those under their instruction and care. These considerations are conclusive; but, apart from them, the miracles, as we have seen, are so inseparably connected with the teaching of Jesus that neither ingredient of the Gospel narratives can be discarded while the other is saved. We cannot reject the accounts of miracles without, also, disbelieving the record of sayings of Christ, which are obviously and undeniably authentic.

Objections to it.

An objection is made to the credibility of the Gospels on the ground of alleged discrepancies.

Alleged discrepancies. The first thing to be said in answer to this objection is that whether these be real or only apparent, they prove that there was no collusion, no conspiracy, between the Evangelists or the informants from whom they, or any of them, derived their matter. The second remark is that discrepancies and inaccuracies belong to human testimony generally. On the principle that a witness or an author is to be discredited if he fails of accuracy in all particulars, it would be impossible to believe anybody. Courts of law would have to be shut up, for the most veracious witnesses seldom agree in all the minutiae which enter into their testimony. All books of history would have to be cast aside, including narratives written from personal observation. Paley says justly: "I know not a more rash or unphilosophical conduct of the understanding than to reject the substance of a story by reason of some diversity in the circumstances with which it is related. The usual character of human testimony is substantial truth under circumstantial variety. This is what the daily experience of courts of justice teaches. When accounts of a transaction come from the mouths of different witnesses, it is seldom that it is not possible to pick out apparent or real inconsistencies between them. These inconsistencies are studiously displayed by an adverse pleader, but often with little impression upon the minds of the judges." Where variations occur in testimony, or inaccuracies in any single witness or reporter, the only question is whether they are of such a number and character as to destroy the general trustworthiness of the narrators, and to cast doubts on the substantial contents of their tale. In the third place, whatever may be thought of minor points of variation from one another, the Gospels can be proved to contain no such instances of diversity in the narration as suffice to weaken their general credibility. It must be remembered that these books are not formal histories. They are memoirs. There is no aim at completeness. They are not put together by expert writers. Circumstances, even very important facts, may be left out of one and recorded by another. In narratives of this character there is often an appearance of contradiction where some additional circumstance, not introduced, would at once dispel this appearance.

It is sometimes made an objection to believing in the New Testament miracles that a great number of miraculous stories have been set afloat which are generally admitted to be fabulous. This objection overlooks the fact that the same thing is true of numberless narratives in which nothing miraculous is involved. Because there are so many instances of mistake or imposition, in what we read or hear, we do not disbelieve in everything that is related.

The objection has no force unless it can be shown that the accounts of miracles which we feel justified in at once rejecting, are as well attested as are the miracles recorded in the Gospels. But this cannot be shown. It must be remembered that the circumstances under which testimony is given, as well

Heathen and ecclesiastical miracles.

as the temper and character of the witness, must be taken into view. The weight of proof is measured by the strength of both of these factors combined.

1. The Gospel miracles are expressly to verify revelation. It was, for the most part, only at marked epochs in the progress of divine revelation that, according to the Scriptures, miracles were wrought. On the contrary, alleged miracles outside of the Scriptures are frequently naked marvels, deriving no support from any high, distinctive purpose which they are to subserve.

2. The Gospel miracles were not wrought in coincidence with a prevailing system of belief, and for the furtherance of it. On the other hand, they were performed in behalf of teaching and of claims which were hostile to established prepossessions. The miracles of Jesus were a part of the means by which faith in him was created and built up. Miracles related by the ancient fathers, or in the mediæval legends, were in harmony with religious beliefs already deeply rooted. They were directly in the line of popular expectations. This is a difference of very great importance.

3. The disposition to deny the reality of the miracles wrought by Christ, or to explain them away, had to be confronted by the Apostolic witnesses. It has been said truly that "exorcism, which is the contemporary Jewish miracle referred to in the Gospels, is evidently, if it stands by itself, and is not confirmed by other and more decided marks of divine power, a miracle of a most doubtful and ambiguous character." To whatever cause the disorder is referred, "a sudden, strong impression," rousing the energy of the patient, might, in less aggravated cases, effect a cure. But, even as to exorcism, the Jews recognized the difference in the cures effected by Jesus from anything familiar in their experience, and were driven to ascribe them to aid afforded by Beelzebub. In general, the miracles of Jesus were such as the people considered in the highest degree unlikely to occur. The statement, which is often made, that there was no idea of natural law, and, therefore, that there was an uninquiring credulity, is contrary to the truth. The idea of the stability of nature is constantly implied in the Gospel narratives. Galilee was a populous district, studded with cities and villages. The minds of the people were sharpened by trade and commerce. They were not illiterate barbarians. They were the countrymen of Josephus. There were superstitions then, as in every age since. But the difference between a natural event and a miracle was understood and felt. The common feeling is expressed in the words, "Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind."¹ Nicodemus said: "No man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him."² The Pharisees and priests said: "Remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, 'After three days, I will rise again.'"¹ Such a claim, they assumed, was characteristic of a deceiver. It was in the midst of such a community, in the face of all this disbelief, that the Apostles told their story.

¹ John ix. 32.

² John iii. 2.

4. They were subjected to the severe test of persecution and suffering. Was it facts that they affirmed? This was the question. Had there been a doubt in their minds, they must have given way under the pressure, not only of authority—the authority of the religious rulers and guides of the people—but, also, of the perils and sufferings which their testimony brought upon them.

5. The habit of mind of the Apostolic witnesses is essentially different from that of the narratives of heathen and ecclesiastical miracles, and of wonders elsewhere reported. Two things vitiate most of the testimony to events of this sort. The first is the lack of a clear perception of facts as they actually occur. The second is an appetite for the marvellous. This last feeling not only obscures the mental vision and is one cause of the fault just mentioned; it also begets a credulity which is fatal to the exercise of judgment respecting the statements of others. Both these defects, which are closely connected together, may coexist with many good traits, including piety. Now, in the case of the Apostolic witnesses, what is remarkable is the sobriety of mind, which leaves the perceptions clear, and with it that conscientious regard for truth which insures strictly veracious testimony.

¹ Matt. xxvii. 63.

The dignity and simplicity of the miracles recorded in the New Testament are, as a rule, in strong contrast with those found in legendary tales. The miracles in the apocryphal Gospels are, as a class, grotesque, fantastic, or otherwise offensive. This is the prevailing character, for example, of the miracles described in the Gospel of the Infancy. The same character, although not always in so excessive a degree, belongs to heathen and mediæval legends. Exceptions occur, but they are exceptions—not numerous enough to efface the contrast between pagan and ecclesiastical miracles in general, and the miracles ascribed to Jesus in the Evangelists.

Finally, we revert to the character of Christ, which is too unique to be the product either of imagination or of conscious invention. When that character, in its immaculate purity, is contemplated, in connection with the declared purpose of his life and mission, “to bear witness to the truth,” and “to seek and to save” the lost, supernatural manifestations of power appear to be a suitable accompaniment of his work in the world. Why not the power, as well as the holiness and love of God? The antecedent improbability of miracle vanishes.

CHAPTER X.

THE PROOF OF THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS FROM THE EVANGELISTS.

Now that the trustworthiness of the Gospel narratives has been established, we can appeal to the testimony to the resurrection of Jesus, which they present. We can reinforce the argument founded on the affirmations of the Apostle Paul, which was presented in a former chapter;¹ although Paul's testimony, even when considered by itself, warrants the conclusion that was drawn from it.

To the transcendent importance of this fact of the resurrection of Jesus, the Apostles were fully alive. They staked upon it their veracity. If he had not risen, they were willing to be considered false witnesses.² The Lord's resurrection was inseparably connected with the whole doctrine of redemption. It was involved in all their hopes of salvation from sin, and of future blessedness.³ They went out to proclaim "Jesus and the resurrection."⁴ The estimate which they put upon this central fact is adapted to inspire confidence in the witness which they gave concerning it. They would take every precaution against mistake respecting a truth on which they were conscious that everything depended.

Importance of the fact.

¹ Ch. VII. ² 1 Cor. xv. 15. ³ 1 Cor. xv. 14. ⁴ Acts xvii. 18.

That Jesus really died is a proposition which it is no longer requisite to defend. If it were possible for him to survive the crucifixion, its prolonged torture, and the wound in the side, and if what appeared to be death could be supposed to have been only a swoon from which he awoke, how could his life in a mortal body have been continued? Where did he go? When did he really die? Such a continuation of his earthly life, if all other difficulties in the supposition were removed, could only have taken place through a consummate effort of deceit at which he himself connived.

It is impossible to account for the alleged interviews of the Apostles with the risen Jesus, by the supposition that they were imaginary and grew out of an idea that, being the Messiah, he must rise from the tomb and appear in bodily form. There was not time for such a process of reasoning to take place in the minds of the Disciples, and for a series of visions, having no basis in reality, to spring out of it. It was on the morning of the third day that, as they affirmed, he appeared to them.¹ Nor can it be reasonably thought that real, miraculous visions of Jesus, parted from the body and entered on the heavenly life, were granted to them. This explanation is precluded by the fact that it was in his bodily form that they beheld him. It is absolutely excluded by the circumstances that attended his manifestations to them.

A real death.

No hallucination.

¹ 1 Cor. xv. 4; Mark xvi. 2, etc.

The empty tomb.

The tomb, it must be remembered, was found empty, with the linen clothes left there, and the napkin folded and lying by itself.¹ The body could not have been carried off by the enemies of Christ. They would have produced it to confute the assertion that he had risen. It could not have been carried away and hidden by his friends, without a fraudulent intent on their part, which none at the present day would impute to them. But the final, unanswerable proof of the resurrection is in the character of the interviews of Jesus with his followers. On the first Sunday there were five of these meetings with him. They were incredulous, but he overcame their incredulity. He spoke to them and they with him. He walked with them. He partook of food with them. They touched him. One of them put his finger upon the print of the nails.² The reality of his bodily presence was attested by what Luke justly calls "infallible proofs,"³ appeals to the senses—appeals of such number and variety as rendered the idea of an illusion absurd.

The interviews.

¹ John xx. 2 seq.; Luke xxvi. 3, etc.

² John xx. 25 seq.

³ Acts i. 3.

Add to these considerations a fact before adverted to. The manifestations of Jesus to the disciples were limited to a certain number of instances. The principal of these Paul refers to. A few others are related in the Gospels. All these interviews ceased after a limited, not very long time. Had they been the product of imagination and enthusiasm, they would have continued, increasing constantly the emotional excitement out of which they sprung. The ablest representative of the skeptical schools of criticism confesses that no explanation can be given of the undoubting and immovable faith of the Apostles in the resurrection of Jesus.¹ There is only one reasonable explanation—namely, that the fact occurred.

¹ F. C. Baur: History of the First Three Centuries, p. 39. He even calls the resurrection a "wunder" (miracle).

CHAPTER XI.

ALLEGED ERRORS OF THE APOSTLES IN MATTERS OF OPINION.

In answer to the objection that the Apostles held to erroneous opinions on certain subjects, it is to be said, in the first place, that no authority Limits of their knowledge. is claimed for the Apostles, and no superiority of knowledge, except on matters involved in their mission, or in the work specially assigned to them by Jesus. They did not themselves pretend that their knowledge of astronomy, or of other sciences, was beyond that of their Jewish contemporaries. In these particulars they may have been greatly excelled by many at that day.

The objection has no force unless it refers to alleged errors in religious opinion. But even on this subject the objection is irrelevant unless it can be shown that the errors in question would invalidate their testimony to the facts which the Gospels record. If the question before us concerned the nature and limits of the inspiration of the Apostles, it would be necessary to consider it, but not where the inquiry is respecting the credibility of their testimony.

It may be well, however, to refer to some points having a close relation to religion, and in regard to which it is said that the Apostles were in error.

One of these is the expectation of the speedy second coming of Christ. Let it be observed that they expressly affirm that the time of his second coming is not revealed. "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels of heaven, neither the Son, but the Father only."¹ After the resurrection of Christ, when they asked him if he would then "restore the kingdom to Israel," he gave this comprehensive answer: "It is not for you to know times or seasons which the Father hath set within his own authority."² The decision of all these questions was reserved by the Father, and was not disclosed to man. We read in John's Gospel that Jesus, speaking of John, said to Peter: "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?"³ This occasioned a report "among the brethren" that John "should not die." But this misconstruction of what Jesus had said is corrected.⁴ "Suppose," says Paley, "that this report had come down to us among the prevailing opinions of the early Christians, and that the particular circumstance from which the mistake sprang had been lost (which, humanly speaking, was most likely to have been the case), some at this day would have been ready to regard and quote the error as an

¹ Matt xxiv. 36.

² Acts i. 7 (Revised Version).

³ John xxi. 22.

⁴ Verse 23.

impeachment of the whole Christian system." "To those who think that the Scriptures lead us to believe that the early Christians, and even the Apostles, expected the approach of the day of judgment in their own times, the same reflection will occur as that which we have made with respect to the more partial, perhaps, and temporary, but still no less ancient error, concerning the duration of St. John's life. It was an error, it may be likewise said, which would effectually hinder those who entertained it from acting the part of impostors." Those who think that the Apostles expected that Christ was to come soon, should not be surprised to find traces of this personal expectation in their writings. Nor ought they to be surprised if the influence of this idea is found to tinge the abbreviated reports of the predictive utterances of Christ which are presented in the Gospels.

Another difficulty in the New Testament narratives relates to what is said of demoniacs. It is represented that the souls of men were possessed by evil spirits, who inflicted on them physical distempers—epilepsy, lunacy, etc. The opinion has been adopted by not a few Christian scholars that the language of Christ on this subject was uttered simply by way of accommodation to a prevalent belief, and in order to effect the cure of those who were under the influence of it. In other words, he entered into the idea of the persons thus afflicted with disease—humored the delusion, as it were—as a means of causing their recovery, and of assuring them of it. Their mistaken belief was harmless, from a religious point of view, and Christ was under no obligation to disabuse them of it, any more than to instruct them on the causes of disease in general, and to clear their minds of other medical delusions.

Christian scholars, to whom this solution is not satisfactory, are content to accept as real the fact of demoniacal possession at that epoch when the minds of men were oppressed and distracted by the inward conflict with evil. It was an extraordinary crisis in the spiritual life of individuals and of society. Too little is known of the supernatural world to warrant a dogmatic denial of the possibility of such an influence exercised by evil spirits.

On either of the views just stated, it remains true that the facts concerning the cure of the so-called demoniacs, of their actual deliverance from aggravated disorders, are authenticated by the testimony. The accounts in the Gospels of the healing of persons of this class are among the most graphic passages in these writings. They contain internal evidence of their verity. Of such a character is the narrative of the madman of Gadara, who cut himself with stones, and made his abode among the tombs. Conversations of Jesus, in connection with miracles of this

Testimony to the facts not weakened.

kind, conversations of unquestionable authenticity, prove the reality of the principal facts with which they are associated.

Difficulties are sometimes raised in reference to occasional interpretations of Old Testament passages, which the Apostles introduce, or Interpretation and reasoning. to certain arguments which they employ. Such difficulties, supposing them to be well-founded, do not affect the value of their testimony to facts. Some would contend that these difficulties have no ground to rest upon. Others would allow with Paley that we must “distinguish between their [the Apostles’] doctrines and their arguments. Their doctrines came to them by revelation, properly so called; yet in propounding these doctrines in their writings or discourses, they were wont to illustrate, support, and enforce them by such analogies, arguments, and considerations, as their own thoughts suggested.” Paley quotes from Bishop Burnet this remark: “When divine writers argue upon any point, we are always bound to believe the conclusions their reasonings end in; but we are not bound to be able to make out, or even to assent to, all the premises made use of by them, in their whole extent, unless it appears plainly that they affirm the premises as expressly as they do the conclusions proved by them.¹”

¹ Paley's Evidences, P. III. ch. II. Burnet's Exposition of the Articles, Art. 6.

CHAPTER XII.

ALLEGED DIFFICULTIES IN THE CONNECTION OF CHRISTIANITY WITH THE OLD TESTAMENT RELIGIOUS SYSTEM.

Objections are frequently made to Christianity on the ground of difficulties connected with the Old Testament, and with references to the Old Testament books in the New Testament.

That the religion of the Old Testament is recognized in the New as from God, and as having a divine sanction, distinguishing it from the religions of the Gentiles, is obvious. That Christianity has a genetic connection with the religion of the Jews, is a plain matter of history. And the contrast between the religion of the Jews and the religious systems of other nations, including those of the same stock—as the Babylonians—is an impressive proof that the sanction given to it by Jesus is well founded. The pure monotheism, the character ascribed to God, the teaching as to his moral and providential government, the spirit of devotion and of worship inspired by this system of faith, bear witness to its unique, supernatural source.

Genetic relation of Christianity to Judaism.

Jesus appealed to prophetic passages in the Old Testament, as pointing to the kingdom which he was to establish, and to the Messiah, its head. He disavowed, moreover, the intention to cast discredit on the prior revelations of law and duty, made in times of old, to Moses and the prophets. All this a Christian accepts both on the authority of Jesus as a teacher, and on account of its inherent reasonableness.

Recognition of the Old Testament.

But neither Christ nor the Apostles took up questions respecting the authorship and date of Old Testament writings—such questions as belong to historical and scholarly inquiry.

Limits of the teaching of Jesus.

Christ refused to act as an umpire in a dispute about an inheritance, saying: "Who made me a judge or divider over you?"¹ This shows how resolved he was to keep within the limits of his own distinctive calling, and not to step aside to perform offices, which, even if they were not unimportant, did not pertain to it. We have a right as Christians to rest on the declarations of Christ on questions respecting which he has pronounced judgment—questions on which he professed to speak "as one having authority." But we go too far when we stake the truth of Christianity on the correctness of opinions concerning which no verdict was intended to be pronounced by Christ or his Apostles.

¹ Luke xii. 14.

But Christ did teach emphatically the gradualness of divine revelation, and the consequent imperfection of religious knowledge, and of the knowledge of duty under the old dispensation. There was a Mosaic law respecting divorce, which fell short of the Christian ideal. It was given, Christ taught, on account of the hardness of heart of the people, who were prepared for nothing better.¹ He substituted for it another, more stringent enactment. John the Baptist, he said, was inferior to no prophet; yet the least Christian disciple was greater than he—was possessed of more light, and stood on a higher plane as regards the perception of God's plans and ways.² The recollection of the gradualness of the revelation of God and of religious truth sets aside at once numerous difficulties which have been alleged respecting the teaching of the Old Testament Scriptures, as well as concerning the lives and the character of persons described and commended in them.

In truth, the connection of the faith of Israel with Christianity most impressively indicates the divine origin of the religion of Jesus. We behold the long course of this historical movement—starting in the remote past, flowing onward, like a river, through all the centuries before Christ, until there it widens into a sea that spreads more and more, as the ages succeed one another, over the surface of the globe. As the birth of Christ divides history into two parts, so his coming furnishes the clue to the understanding of it. His offices of love and mercy to the race unveil the purpose of God, the interpretation of his plan, as regards mankind, including Jew and Gentile, both before and since the SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD appeared. To each branch of the human race, to each of the nations of the earth, Providence assigned the place and the period of its existence, guiding and training all, to the end that they might seek after God, and fulfil, each its allotted part, in the world-wide kingdom which Christ was sent to establish.

¹ Matt. xix. 8; Mark x. 5.

² Matt. xi. 11; Luke vii. 28.

CHAPTER XIII.

PROOF OF CHRISTIANITY FROM PROPHECY.

Prophecy is a species of miracle. There are limits to the power of human foresight. The field beyond Nature of the argument. is open to conjecture, but is excluded from trustworthy prediction. Prophecy which is fulfilled under circumstances that forbid the supposition of mere coincidence or accident, and the supposition that it causes its own fulfilment through some influence exerted by it, necessarily involves supernatural agency. Nothing else can account for the conformity of the event with the prediction. If it could be shown respecting one who utters predictions that in some instances they fail of accomplishment, even then the cases in which they are verified, provided they cannot be resolved into fortunate guesses, prove that at certain times, or to a certain degree, he is gifted with superhuman foresight.

The Old Testament contains a large predictive element. It might be said with truth that a stream of Prophecy pervasive in the Old Testament. prophecy runs through the Old Testament Scriptures. The religious guides of the Hebrew people ever looked forward to a grand future for which the present was only a preparation. There are three striking particulars in which this prophetic character of Old Testament teaching, and of the devotional utterances connected with it, appears. First, there is to be a great improvement in the religion itself. It is to take on a purer, more spiritual form.¹ Secondly, it is to have a world-wide predominance.² The heathen nations are to embrace it, or to be brought under its sway. The whole earth is to acknowledge Jehovah. Thirdly, this spread and domination of the Old Testament religion is to be secured by the Messiah. A great leader, guide, prince is to appear, under whom the kingdom of God is to become universal. Righteousness and blessing are to attend its progress. The prophetic pictures vary in form. Elements derived from the kingdom of the Jews and from their religion in its then existing form naturally colored the anticipations and mingled in the visions of the seer and the saint. But these subordinate features, in which prophecy varies from actual experience or accurately written history, do not lessen the profound impression which these predictive declarations of the Old Testament, viewed in connection with what we know of Christ and of Christianity, are adapted to make. The insight of the prophets into the plan of God has been verified in the events of subsequent ages, down to the present time.

¹ Jeremiah xxxi. 31-35.

² Is. ii. 2, etc.

There was a class of prophets among the Hebrews. To foretell future events was only an inci-

The class of prophets. dental, it was not the principal, function of their office. They professed to be called of God to instruct, to encourage, and to warn the people.

They spoke with an eloquence which made men feel that they were animated by an influence from above, and that God spoke through them. This was true, for example, of the Prophet Isaiah. A part of their predictions cover the points referred to in the preceding remarks. The coming perfection and glory of the kingdom, and of the Messiah its head, was their theme. But, besides these prophecies of a more general nature, there were uttered, in special

Particular predictions. exigencies, predictions of particular events in the near or more distant future. They were prophecies which did not spring from any statesmanlike sagacity or power of forecast. The prophets might be called from humble vocations in life. Amos was a herdsman. The prophetic insight, or foresight, went beyond the possible reach of human calculation. An instance of prophecy of the kind here referred to is the predictions of Isaiah respecting the rapidly approaching downfall of the kingdoms of Israel and Syria, which had concluded an alliance with each other, and of the failure of their project against Judah.¹ Another instance is Isaiah's prophecy of the failure of the powerful

¹ Isaiah vii.

army of the Assyrian king, Sennacherib, in his siege of Jerusalem.¹ Among the prophecies respecting the Messiah and his work, the passage in Isaiah concerning the servant of God is remarkable.² It contains verses which cannot refer to the people as a body, or to the pious kernel of the nation. Of such a character is verse 6: "All we have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." The prophecy has reference to one individual, and its correspondence to the experience of Christ is close. That Jesus himself foretold the coming destruction of Jerusalem is proved by the testimony of the first three Evangelists. More impressive than the prediction of any single event is the foreknowledge he had of the spread of the Gospel and of the victory of his kingdom. It was to grow like the mustard-seed, and to spread its influence like the hidden leaven.

¹ Isaiah xxxvii. 21 seq.

² Isaiah lii. 13-liv.

CHAPTER XIV.

ARGUMENT FOR CHRISTIANITY FROM THE CONVERSION AND THE CAREER OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

About four years after the crucifixion, Saul of Tarsus, a man of great ability and sincerity, who belonged to the sect of the Pharisees, was trained in a rabbinical school at Jerusalem, and was zealous in persecuting Christian disciples, was converted, and became the principal agent in planting the Gospel in the cities of the Roman Empire. His conversion was sudden. "It pleased God," he says, "to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen."¹ The particulars of his conversion, when he was on the road to Damascus, on an errand of persecution, are related by Luke in the Acts. Miraculous circumstances attended it.²

It is impossible to account for this event by merely natural causes. The only theory of this nature which has been advanced is the one to which we have adverted on a preceding page³—the theory of hallucination. But, as we have said, his was not the state of mind out of which an illusion of this sort could be engendered. He expressly states

His state of mind.

¹ Gal. i. 16.

² Acts ix. 2 seq., xxii. 5 seq.

³ Page 83.

that he had no misgivings in regard to the rectitude of the course he was pursuing. "I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth."¹ He had been a persecutor, he tells us, but found mercy because he "did it ignorantly, in unbelief."² He was, to be sure, engaged in a hard, wearisome struggle to live up to his idea of legal righteousness. The yoke of the law pressed heavily upon him. This was a silent, unconscious preparation for the relief which the Gospel was to afford; but the immediate effect of this conscientious legalism was not to excite in him the least favor to the Christian cause, the least inclination to regard Jesus as the Messiah. The effect, on the contrary, was to increase his zeal in putting down what he considered a wicked and baneful heresy. As we have remarked, the expression, "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks," does not imply, or remotely suggest, the presence in his mind of compunction or inward opposition to the work in which he was engaged. It was a proverbial expression, signifying that he was embarked in a futile enterprise—one that would not avail to crush the cause of Christ, but would, the longer he persevered in it, harm himself the more. The metaphor was taken from the conflict of oxen with the driver behind them, and their vain attempt to resist him by kicking against the goad.

¹ Acts xxvi. 9.

² 1 Tim. i. 13.

To say that the occurrence which turned Paul from an ardent enemy to a devoted friend of the cause of the Gospel was only "a vision" explains nothing. If it were only a vision it would be necessary to show how a vision of that character could take place, save by supernatural agency. But it has been explained how the Apostle distinctly implies that the perception which he had of Christ at his conversion was of an entirely different character from the disclosures which he subsequently had in apocalyptic visions.¹

Besides the miracle involved, the conversion of Paul was a wonderful transformation of character.

His whole aim in life was changed. Along with this revolution of purpose there arose within him new tempers of heart—the spirit of humility and love, of patience and forgiveness; in a word, the spirit of Christ.

The result of that incident on the road to Damascus was the marvellous career of Paul as a preacher of Christianity, and a most remarkable and successful propagator of the faith which he had been trampling under foot. How different would the history of Europe have been, how different the history of mankind, had the labors of Paul as an apostle of the Cross never been performed!

It is important to add that the Apostle Paul himself wrought miracles. We have his word for it, and no one doubts his truthfulness. In the Epistle to the Romans, he explicitly refers to “the mighty signs and wonders” which Christ had wrought by him.¹ So he reminds the Corinthians, in his Second Epistle to them, of “the signs and wonders and mighty deeds” which had been wrought by him before their eyes.² They were “signs” of “the Apostle;” that is, of the Apostolic office. Now we find that the direction to work miracles was in the commission given by Christ to the Apostles.³ It cannot reasonably be doubted that the miracles of Paul and of the other Apostles were consciously done in pursuance of this commission. It is safe to conclude that Jesus himself professed to work miracles, and that the Apostles, in this particular, had not only his precept, but his example before them.

¹ 1 Cor. xv. 8.

¹ Rom. xv. 19.

² 2 Cor. xii. 12.

³ Matt. x. 1, 8; Mark iii. 15, etc.

CHAPTER XV.

PROOF OF THE DIVINE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY FROM THE INTRINSIC EXCELLENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN SYSTEM.

In paving the way for the consideration of the evidence for miracles, prominent peculiarities of Christianity, including the character of Jesus, were touched upon. Brief additional observations will here be made on leading features of the Gospel.

The Christian conception of God represents him as a being who unites with infinite power and wisdom the moral attributes of holiness and love. He does not, as in the creed of Deism, stand apart from the world, nor is he, as in the creed of Pantheism, identified with it. He is immanent in the world, present with his all-pervading energy, "not far from any one of us," yet personal, acquainted with all our thoughts, and hearing prayer. Man is declared to be made in the image of God, and qualified, therefore, for conscious intercourse and fellowship with him. Moral evil is not confounded with physical evil, or made its product, but is traced back to the voluntary separation of mankind from God, and to the consequent rule in their nature of propensities which ought to be kept subordinate. In the recovery of mankind, "the axe is laid at the root of the tree." In the Restorer, Jesus Christ, God is manifested, and, at the same time, the ideal of human perfection is realized. God is re-connected with mankind. Reconciliation is effected in a way that brings no cloud upon the holiness of the divine character and government. In Christ, the life of communion with the divine Father, and of peace in that relation, is maintained in the conflict with temptation, in the face of the world's hatred, and on the cross. That inward life is communicated to all who are attracted to him as disciples and followers. It is nourished within them by the invisible Spirit, replacing his visible presence. In the new relation to Christ, and through him to the Father, they detach themselves from every earthly object regarded as an idol, or an indispensable good, and thus gain strength to endure "the loss of all things." They form a community of the children of God, drawing within itself all who aspire after the life of sonship and of oneness with the Father. Life on the earth becomes a school for the training of the soul for a higher state of existence in the future. To them, all suffering is the chastisement of a Father, and death is a door of access to a heavenly abode. The entire course of events, including the most minute, is ordered of Christ.

The Christian's inward life.

God, so that all things work together for good to them that love him.

To use the world, and not abuse it, to enjoy the world without being a slave to it, is the Christian's privilege. An excessive value is to be attached to no form of earthly happiness; but, on the other hand, asceticism, together with a cynical contempt for human relations and pleasures, is equally precluded.

Christianity is a religion of principles, not of rules. In the room of specific and minute precepts, it sets forth the great ends with reference to which conduct is to be shaped.

But within these bounds the individual is left, for the most part, to be guided by his own intelligence and moral sense. The aim is to mould aright the leading motives of action, so that a man shall be a law to himself, and spontaneity shall take the place of legal restraint. The supreme law is affirmed to be love, than which no higher or more comprehensive principle of action can be imagined. Discipleship is not a literal imitation of Christ, a copying of his particular actions, but rather the living appropriation of his spirit. No type of goodness more worthy can be conceived of than the one presented in the actual life of Jesus.

Christianity is adapted to be the religion of the world. It has all the requisites of a universal religion. It teaches the equality of the race before not ascetic.

The Gospel

Christianity a religion of principles.

God, the brotherhood of mankind, the common depravity of men, and the consequent common need of forgiveness and of deliverance from sin. The salvation provided in the Gospel is suited, not to any single nation or to any branch of the human family exclusively, but equally to every member of the race. In the community of Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew, bond nor free, male nor female.¹ The "good news" of the love of God to the ill-deserving is to be carried to "every creature." With the proclamation of human guilt and sin, there are carried the tidings of an atonement, of pardon, of the means of purification.

Can a religion having this lofty character and this adaptation to the world be attributed to the Galilean laborers who were concerned in the first teaching of it? Can it be considered as the offspring of merely human purity and wisdom?

¹ Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11.

CHAPTER XVI.

PROOF AFFORDED BY THE CONTRAST OF CHRISTIANITY WITH OTHER RELIGIONS AND WITH PHILOSOPHICAL SYSTEMS.

Christianity, when it is compared with the other religions of the world, is seen to be the one true, or absolute religion. It is free from the defects that belong to them. It supplies the elements which are missing in them. It fills out what is wanting in an inchoate system, true in its foundations, but incomplete, as was the religion of the Old Testament.

The religion of the ancient Persians, the worshippers of light, who professed to derive their faith from Zoroaster, divided the empire of the world between two antagonistic deities. The creed was dualism, a theory that also mingles itself in the Pantheistic religions of India. Confucius, the sage of China, was a moralist. He was the author of ethical and political precepts not without value, but he made no claim to reveal things invisible. It is often said that the golden rule is found in Confucius. But in him, and in every other ethnic writer to whom it is ascribed, it occurs either in a negative form, or merely in some particular relation—for example, as defining the duty of the parent to the child. The same thing is true of the golden rule as it is found in the Rabbis. Two or three sentences of the Lord's Prayer appear to have existed in earlier Jewish forms of devotion. The originality of Jesus is seen in the addition of these to the other petitions, and the union of all in a living whole; just as the golden rule acquires a deeper meaning when it is coupled with his teaching on what man ought to desire for himself and to count as the true good. But the originality of the Gospel lies especially in the relation of its moral precepts to religious doctrine, and to the new life which is implanted through the connection of the believer with Christ.

The Zoroastrian religion.

Confucius.

Originality of the Gospel.

The only two religions, besides the religion of Christ, which can pretend to the character of universality, are Mohammedanism and Buddhism. Mohammedanism derived its materials from Rabbinical sources, and thus, indirectly, from the Old Testament revelation. In its earnest faith in the unity of God, and in its protest against idolatry, it was in sympathy with the teaching of the Bible. In these doctrines, heartily embraced, lay the secret of the power of Islam, as far as that power was legitimate. But there were two grand defects in its theology. There was no such exaltation of the love of God, the highest attribute of his character, as the Bible contains; and there was no room for the unfolding of a grander future, such as the Messianic hope of the Old Testament involved. The moral code of Islam includes a sanction of polygamy and slavery. The desire of sensual gratification enters into the hope of paradise, and this reward is held out as one motive to the believer. Under Mohammedanism, woman can never rise above a degraded condition, or approach that equality with man which Christianity has secured for her. Mohammedanism is a religion to be propagated by force, the employment of which for the overcoming of error Christianity forbids. It is, moreover, the religion of the letter. The disciple is forever bound to observe all the special precepts of the Koran. There is only a nominal and ignorant recognition of Christ. The elevating and consoling influences which, to the Christian mind, connect themselves with the name of Jesus, are wanting in the creed of the Mohammedan devotee.

Owing to these characteristics of Islam it is not capable of advancing the nations that embrace it beyond a certain stage of progress. There civilization, all that pertains to the higher life of man, is petrified in immovable forms, or gives way to decrepitude and decay.

Buddhism inculcated certain virtues. It enjoined self-conquest and universal kindness. It laid down Buddhism, a number of special precepts which resemble injunctions of the New Testament. But these moral rules are linked in Buddhism with a system of Pantheism and with the exhortation to renounce the desire of a future life. The doctrine of "Karma" involves no such thing as continued personal identity and immortality. Nirvana, the state of bliss, is tranquillity here, and extinction, as far as identity of consciousness is concerned, hereafter. Buddhism promised a release from the burdens of caste and the dread of transmigration. This negative good was the boon which it offered, and accounts for its progress in the land of its origin. But the Buddhistic religion brought in an ascetic, a monkish system hardly less fruitful of misery than the two-fold curse which it aimed to displace. "In it we have an ethical system but no lawgiver, a world without a creator, a salvation without eternal life, and a sense of evil but no conception of pardon, atonement, reconciliation, or redemption."¹

In ancient times there were systems of philosophy which sought to afford light and solace to the minds of men. Socrates, the best of the Philosophy. heathen teachers, although he believed in a supreme Deity, still held also to "lords many and gods many," and mingled with the hope Socrates. of another life an admixture of doubt. He felt the need of some sure "word of God" to Plato. guide us in the right way.² Plato taught that virtue is likeness to God according to the measure of human power; but his conception of God, both as to his natural and moral attributes, fell decidedly below that of Christian theism. Moreover, to the question how to attain to such a resemblance to God, how to conquer the evil within us, he could give no satisfactory answer. He mistook the source of moral evil, which he made to be chiefly ignorance; and philosophy, which he conceived of as the proper remedy for such a malady, he held that only a few were competent to understand. The two systems most in vogue when the Gospel was first preached in the Roman Empire were Epicureanism and Stoicism. It was Epicureans and Stoics who encountered the Apostle Paul

¹ T. W. Rhys Davids, in Non-Christian Religions, p. 131. ² Apol. 21.

The Epicureans. at Athens.¹ The Epicureans disconnected the gods from all concern with the affairs of men. They were practically atheists. They made the sum of human virtue to be a self-regarding prudence. Stoicism was a nobler system. It enjoined, as the source of peace, resignation to the divine will; but that divine will was indistinguishable from fate, and the repose of mind of the Stoic sage was gained at the cost of quelling and chilling the natural emotions. In the room of fellowship with Zeus, the Supreme One, the thing aimed at was an independence of Zeus, a proud self-reliance. Suicide was held to be lawful, and might be expedient; for notwithstanding all that was said of the wise order of the world, there were situations, it was thought, when a man was bound by self-respect to put an end to his own life. In the Stoic system, there was no rational motive for the existence of the world. There was no good to be attained by the divine Providence of which the Stoic spoke; for all things were to issue in a universal conflagration.

¹ Acts xvii. 18.

In contrast with all the ancient systems of philosophy, Christianity brought forward such a conception of God that the precept to be like him was intelligible and could be profitably obeyed. It brought forward the truth of a Providence of God, extending over all persons and events, a universal care comprehending the least of God's creatures, and causing all things to conspire to promote the well-being of his children. Natural sensibility is not petrified. Natural emotions and affections are left in healthy activity, but trust in the fatherly love and wisdom of God enables the afflicted to be at peace. Moreover, in distinction from all other religions and philosophies, Christianity provides redemption. That is to say, while it holds up the ideal of perfection, the law of righteousness, it provides, at the same time, effectual means of attaining, through Jesus Christ, to the partial, and ultimately to the complete, realization of it.

When the incomparable superiority of the Christian system over the other religions of the world

Christianity
and philosophy.

and over the highest achievements of philosophy is duly appreciated, it appears unreasonable to think that Christianity sprang from the unaided intelligence of the humble, unlettered Hebrews who were the instruments of publishing its truths to the world.

CHAPTER XVII.

CORROBORATIVE PROOF OF THE TRUTH OF CHRISTIANITY FROM ITS UTILITY.

As pernicious tendencies and consequences would prove that a religion is false, so a demonstrated beneficence is evidence, not without weight, that the system of religion having this tendency and effect is true. It is said of certain heathen religions and of Mohammedanism that they are productive of good. This is conceded up to a certain degree. This result may be attributed to elements of truth which they contain. But Christianity differs in being useful without any drawback, and to an extent wholly without parallel.

Christ styled his followers "the light of the world" and "the salt of the earth." This they proved themselves to be. They failed then, as afterwards, to live up to the standard of Christian character and conduct. Nevertheless, Christianity illuminated the world, pouring a flood of light on man and his relations to God, on human duties, and the design and issues of our life on earth. And Christianity powerfully and effect-ally counteracted the tendencies to demoralization and ruin. It rescued society from the decay and moral putrefaction into which it was rapidly sinking. In the midst of a falling world, it planted the seeds of a better civilization.

Light and Life.

Christianity asserted the incalculable worth of every human soul. It declared that no individual is made to be the mere instrument of another's gratification. The welfare of every individual is an end in itself. Hence the Gospel insisted on the equality of all men before God. At the same time, self-sacrifice was made the supreme duty and was declared to be the source of the highest blessedness to him who practises it. These principles were the foundation of liberty and the fountain of beneficence. Not only was the ideal of virtue set forth; new, inspiring motives to the practice of it were presented in the mission and example of Jesus. The result of the influence of Christianity was the purification of domestic life. The rigor of paternal authority was softened. The wife and mother was elevated to her true place. Christianity has raised woman from degradation. It has improved, in a corresponding measure, the lot of children. It has immeasurably improved the condition of the laboring classes, by insisting that they shall have their just dues. The poor and unfortunate became objects of compassion and recipients of practical aid in multiform ways. Christianity promoted civil liberty. It inculcated loyalty, but put an end to the unqualified domination of the State. While the magistrate was to be obeyed as the minister of God, he was to be disobeyed if he enjoined anything against the divine law. The process began of conforming civil law to the requirements of justice. "Stranger" was no longer the synonym of "enemy." International law has taken on a new character under the influence of the Christian religion, in which are recognized the rights of nations, even the weakest. The spirit of charity, no longer confined by the bounds of nation and kindred, embraces all mankind. Such were the inherent tendencies, and such has been the actual power of Christianity, that its effect on the individual was properly styled "a new creation."¹ One looking at the influence of Christianity in the first centuries after it appeared, and in the ages following to the present time, sees the result of that revolution in personal character, of which the Apostle said: "The old things are passed away; behold, they are become new."

Effects of Christianity.

The transforming effect of Christianity is the miracle of history. A religion adequate to the production of such beneficent results must have God for its author.

¹ 2 Cor. v. 17 (Revised Version).

CHAPTER XVIII.

CORROBORATIVE PROOF OF CHRISTIANITY FROM ITS RAPID SPREAD IN THE FIRST CENTURIES.

The rapid progress of a religion may be owing to the indulgence granted by it to immoral practices, or to the use of force in the dissemination of it. In this way the victories of Islam are partly to be accounted for. Or the spread of a religion may be caused by the hope inspired of a deliverance from grievous burdens imposed by a religious system previously dominant, even although the new faith is not, on the whole, of an ennobling character. This explains the progress of Buddhism in India; while the ready junction or identification of Buddhism with the existing religions of China and Japan gave it a free course in those countries.

To neither of these causes was the surprising conquest of the Roman Empire by the Christian faith due. It was at variance with the selfish, national ambition of the Jews, with their tenacious clinging to their ritual, and with their bigoted assumption of superiority over every other people. The Gospel demanded of the heathen the required.

Self denial

renunciation of all their objects of worship, of all the employments and amusements that involved participation in the ancestral and legal forms of devotion. More than this, it required inexorably the forsaking of every species of immorality, and the subjugation of every desire for forbidden pleasures. It was supported by no influential class—not by the rich, or learned, or those holding high social or official stations. By these generally, it was regarded with disdain. Christians were objects of popular contempt. Soon severe laws were enforced against them, and they became victims both of legal and of mob violence. To become a Christian was to expose one's self to the "loss of all things." Yet notwithstanding all these requirements and all these exposures, Christianity continued to make converts rapidly, until it became clear that Roman imperial authority was not strong enough to extirpate the new faith or to stay its advance. At length, in the space of a few centuries, the altars of heathenism were deserted, and the last vestiges of heathen worship passed away.

The proximate causes of this rapid progress, Gibbon makes to be five: The zeal of the early Christians, which he represents to have been derived from the Jews, but to have been purged of Jewish narrowness; the doctrine of a future life of rewards and punishments; the power of working miracles, ascribed to the

Gibbon on the progress of Christianity.

primitive Church ; the pure and austere morals of the Christians, and the union and discipline of the Christian republic—the ecclesiastical community. But these causes are distinct from one another. How, it has been pertinently asked, did they come to be combined in the same persons ? How shall we account for this coincidence ? How, for example, did zeal come to be cleared of narrowness ? and how happened this ardor, mixed with liberality, to be associated with the Christian doctrine respecting the future life ? Then it is obvious that these causes are, one and all, the effect of Christianity—ingredients of the Gospel or its natural consequences. The solution, therefore, amounts to this, that the cause of the rapid diffusion of Christianity was Christianity itself, or qualities inhering in it.

This is in effect the solution of a more recent writer who has undertaken to make clear the causes of the conversion of Rome.¹ It was not the alleged miracles ; it was not, in any considerable degree, the reasoning from prophecy, which achieved the great conquest.² It was “the elements of power and attraction” which the new religion combined. These were its freedom from “local ties ;” its strong appeal to the affections ; its “pure and noble system of ethics ;” its doctrine of the brotherhood of man, and of “the supreme sanctity of love.” To the philosopher it was at once "the echo of the highest ethics of the later Stoics, and the expansion of the best teaching of the school of Plato." To a world weary of lower ideals, Christianity presented "an ideal of compassion and love—an ideal destined for centuries to draw around it all that was greatest, as well as all that was noblest upon earth—a Teacher who could weep by the sepulchre of his friend, who was touched with the feeling of our infirmities."¹ "The chief cause of its success was the congruity of its teaching with the spiritual nature of mankind." "It planted its roots so deeply in the hearts of men," "because it corresponded with their religious wants, aims, and emotions, because the whole spiritual being could then expand and expatiate under its influence." The author who has thus traced the early triumph of Christianity mainly to its own inherent, exalted characteristics, leaves unsolved the problem of the origin of a system whose power sprang from its transcendent worth. Those who believe, with a living faith, in a personal God will not find it unreasonable to accept the explanation which the New Testament presents, and refer this world-transforming Gospel to divine revelation.

¹ Lecky : History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne, vol. i., p. 409 seq.

² P. 409.

¹ P. 412.

INDEX.

- ACTS, genuineness of the, 62
Alogi, 64
Apostles, the, not victims of hallucination, 44; their trustworthiness, 70 seq.; their candor, 71 seq.; their sobriety, 79; tested by sufferings, 79; their alleged errors in doctrine, 86 seq.; their views on the Second Advent, 85; their interpretations and reasonings, 90
- BARNABAS, the Epistle of, its quotations from Matthew, 55
Baur, F. C., 85
Buddhism, 109
Burnet, Bishop, 90
Byron, 24
- CELSUS, 69
Christ, his character, 32, 81; his perfection, 35; not self-deceived, 36; his sanction of the Old Testament religion, 92; limits of his teaching, 92. See "Resurrection"
Christianity, the needs met by it, 25 seq.; admitted facts of, 28; its rapid spread, 29; its influence, 30; its divine origin shown by the character of Christ, 32; its leading features, 103 seq.; a religion of principles, 105; a religion for the world, 106; contrasted with other systems, 107 seq.; proof from its utility, 114 seq.; proof from its rapid spread, 117 seq.
Church, the Christian, its rise, 30
- DEMONIACS, 86
- EPICUREANISM, 111
Evidence, historical, its nature, 4; probable and demonstrative, 5; cumulative, 5; internal and external, 6; the affections, a source of, 7
- GENUINENESS of a book, its meaning, 3
Gibbon, on the spread of Christianity, 118
God, his benevolence, 24
Gospels, their genuineness, 47 seq.; Irenæus respecting the,

- 48 seq. ; Justin Martyr's use of them, 50 seq. ; Tatian's use of them, 53 ; references to them in Polycarp, 54 ; in "The Teaching," etc., 55 ; the witness of the ancient versions to the, 56 ; internal evidence for the, 60 seq. ; local references in the, 61 ; mystical theory respecting the, 73 ; alleged discrepancies in the, 74 ; their testimony to the resurrection of Christ, 82 seq. See the Gospels severally
- HORACE, 24
- Hume, his argument against miracles, 15 seq.
- Huxley, on Hume's argument, 17
- INSPIRATION, what is it ? 2
- Irenæus, his witness to the Gospels, 48 seq. ; his relation to Polycarp, 49, 65
- JEWS, their religion, 28
- John the Baptist, 28 ; performed no miracles, 40
- John, the Gospel of, used by Justin, 53 ; its relation to the first three Gospels, 63 ; local references in, 65 ; the author's way of disclosing himself, 66 ; attestation at the end of, 67 ; not written by disciples of John, 68 ; a kind of autobiography, 68. See "Gospels"
- Josephus, 28
- Justin Martyr, his witness to the Gospels, 50 seq. ; to John's Gospel, 53
- LECKY, on the early progress of Christianity, 119
- Luke, an attendant of Paul, 61
- Luke, the writings of, 61. See "Gospels" and "Acts"
- MARK, the Gospel of, Papias on, 57. See "Gospels"
- Matthew, the Gospel of, quoted in Barnabas, 55 ; Papias on 57. See "Gospels"
- Mill, J. S., his comment on Hume's argument, 16
- Miracles, definition of, 9 ; terms for, in the New Testament, 10 ; not without a cause, 11 ; Hume's argument against, 15 ; prove design, 18 ; can evil spirits perform them ? 18 ; their relation, as proofs, to doctrine, 18 ; the sinlessness of Jesus, one of them, 35 ; presupposed in the teaching of Christ, 37 seq. ; heathen and ecclesiastical, 76 seq. ; wrought by Paul, 101
- Mohammedanism, 108
- Mythical theory, 73
- OLD TESTAMENT system, its relation to Christianity, 91 ; its prophetic character, 95 seq.
- PALEY, 75, 90 ; on the need of Revelation, 22
- Papias, his account of Mark and Matthew, 57
- Paul, his witness to the resurrection of Jesus, 41 seq. ; his conversion, miraculous, 42 seq., 99 seq. ; wrought miracles, 101
- Plato, 110

- Polycarp, his relation to Irenæus, 49, 65; quotes from Matthew and John, 54
- Presumption, logical, its meaning, 21
- Prophecy, proof from, 95 seq.
- RÉNAN, 37, 65
- Resurrection of Jesus, testimony of Paul respecting it, 41 seq.; proved from the Evangelists, 82 seq.
- Revelation, antecedent probability of, 22; the need of, 23 seq.; the need of, met by Christianity, 25
- SOCRATES, 110
- Stoicism, 111
- Strauss, D. F., 37, 73
- TATIAN, his "Diatesseron," 53
"Teaching of the XII Apostles," as a witness to the Gospels, 55
- UNIFORMITY of nature, 13
- VERSIONS, the ancient, their witness to the Gospels, 56
- ZOROASTER, 107

CHURCH HISTORY.

THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY. With a View of the State of the Roman World at the Birth of Christ. By GEORGE P. FISHER, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Church History in Yale College. 8vo, $2.50.

THE BOSTON ADVERTISER.—"Prof. Fisher has displayed in this, as in his previous published writings, that catholicity and that calm judicial quality of mind which are so indispensable to a true historical critic."

THE EXAMINER.—"The volume is not a dry repetition of well-known facts. It bears the marks of original research. Every page glows with freshness of material and choiceness of diction."

THE EVANGELIST.—"The volume contains an amount of information that makes it one of the most useful of treatises for a student in philosophy and theology, and must secure for it a place in his library as a standard authority."

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By GEORGE P. FISHER, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Yale University. 8vo, with numerous maps, $3.50.

This work is in several respects notable. It gives an able presentation of the subject in a single volume, thus supplying the need of a complete and at the same time condensed survey of Church History. It will also be found much broader and more comprehensive than other books of the kind. The following will indicate its aim and scope.

FROM THE PREFACE.—"There are two particulars in which I have sought to make the narrative specially serviceable. In the first place the attempt has been made to exhibit fully the relations of the history of Christianity and of the Church to contemporaneous secular history. * * * I have tried to bring out more distinctly than is usually done the interaction of events and changes in the political sphere, with the phenomena which belong more strictly to the ecclesiastical and religious province. In the second place it has seemed to me possible to present a tolerably complete survey of the history of theological doctrine. * * *

"It has appeared to me better to express frankly the conclusions to which my investigations have led me, on a variety of topics where differences of opinion exist, than to take refuge in ambiguity or silence. Something of the dispassionate temper of an onlooker may be expected to result from historical studies if long pursued; nor is this an evil, if there is kept alive a warm sympathy with the spirit of holiness and love, wherever it is manifest.

"As this book is designed not for technical students exclusively, but for intelligent readers generally, the temptation to enter into extended and minute discussions on perplexed or controverted topics has been resisted."

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D. New Edition, re-written and enlarged. Vol. I.—Apostolic Christianity, A.D. 1—100. Vol. II.—Ante-Nicene Christianity, A.D. 100—325. Vol. III.—Nicene and Post-Nicene Christianity, A.D. 311—600. Vol. IV.—Mediæval Christianity, A.D. 590—1073. 8vo, price per vol., $4.00.

This work is extremely comprehensive. All subjects that properly belong to a complete sketch are treated, including the history of Christian art, hymnology, accounts of the lives and chief works of the Fathers of the Church, etc. The great theological, christological, and anthropological controversies of the period are duly sketched; and in all the details of history the organizing hand of a master is distinctly seen, shaping the mass of materials into order and system.

PROF. GEO. P. FISHER, of Yale College.—"Dr. Schaff has thoroughly and successfully accomplished his task. The volumes are replete with evidences of a careful study of the original sources and of an extraordinary and, we might say, unsurpassed acquaintance with the modern literature—German, French, and English—in the department of ecclesiastical history. They are equally marked by a fair-minded, conscientious spirit, as well as by a lucid, animated mode of presentation."

PROF. ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D.D.—"In no other single work of its kind with which I am acquainted will students and general readers find so much to instruct and interest them."

DR. JUL. MULLER, of Halle.—"It is the only history of the first six centuries which truly satisfies the wants of the present age. It is rich in results of original investigation."

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH OF CHRIST, IN CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES. A Synchronistic View of the Events, Characteristics, and Culture of each period, including the History of Polity, Worship, Literature, and Doctrines, together with two Supplementary Tables upon the Church in America; and an Appendix, containing the series of Councils, Popes, Patriarchs, and other Bishops, and a full Index. By the late HENRY B. SMITH, D.D., Professor in the Union Theological Seminary of the City of New York. Revised Edition. Folio, $5.00.

REV. DR. W. G. T. SHEDD.—"Prof. Smith's Historical Tables are the best that I know of in any language. In preparing such a work, with so much care and research, Prof. Smith has furnished to the student an apparatus that will be of life-long service to him"

REV. DR. WILLIAM ADAMS.—"The labor expended upon such a work is immense, and its accuracy and completeness do honor to the research and scholarship of its author, and are an invaluable acquisition to our literature."

LECTURES ON THE HISTORY OF THE JEWISH CHURCH. By ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, D.D. With Maps and Plans. New Edition from New Plates, with the author's latest revision. Part I.—From Abraham to Samuel. Part II.—From Samuel to the Captivity. Part III.—From the Captivity to the Christian Era. Three vols., 12mo (sold separately), each $2.00.

The same—Westminster Edition. Three vols., 8vo (sold in sets only), per set, $9.00.

LECTURES ON THE HISTORY OF THE EASTERN CHURCH. With an introduction on the Study of Ecclesiastical History. By ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, D.D. New Edition from New Plates. 12mo, $2.00.

LECTURES ON THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. By ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, D.D. 8vo, $1.50.

In all that concerns the external characteristics of the scenes and persons described, Dr. Stanley is entirely at home. His books are not dry records of historic events, but animated pictures of historic scenes and of the actors in them, while the human motives and aspects of events are brought out in bold and full relief.

THE LONDON CRITIC.—“Earnest, eloquent, learned, with a style that is never monotonous, but luring through its eloquence, the lectures will maintain his fame as author, scholar, and divine. We could point out many passages that glow with a true poetic fire, but there are hundreds pictorially rich and poetically true. The reader experiences no weariness, for in every page and paragraph there is something to engage the mind and refresh the soul.”

THE NEW ENGLANDER.—“We have first to express our admiration of the grace and graphic beauty of his style. The felicitous discrimination in the use of language which appears on every page is especially required on these topics, where the author's position might so easily be mistaken through an unguarded statement. Dr. Stanley is possessed of the prime quality of an historical student and writer—namely, the historical feeling, or sense, by which conditions of life and types of character, remote from our present experience, are vividly conceived of and truly appreciated.”

THE N. Y. TIMES.—“The Old Testament History is here presented as it never was presented before; with so much clearness, elegance of style, and historic and literary illustration, not to speak of learning and soundness of judgment, that not theologians alone, but also cultivated readers generally, are drawn to its pages. In point of style it takes rank with Macaulay's History and the best chapters of Froebel.”

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

THE DAWN OF HISTORY. An Introduction to Pre-Historic Study. Edited by C. F. KEARY. 12mo, $1.25.

This work treats successively of the earliest traces of man in the remains discovered in caves or elsewhere in different parts of Europe; of language, its growth, and the story it tells of the pre-historic users of it; of the races of mankind, early social life, the religions, mythologies, and folk-tales of mankind, and of the history of writing.

NATION.—“The book may be heartily recommended as probably the most satisfactory summary of the subject that there is.”

BOSTON SAT. EVE. GAZETTE.—“A fascinating manual, without a vestige of the dullness usually charged against scientific works. In its way, the work is a model of what a popular scientific work should be.”

THE ORIGIN OF NATIONS. By Professor GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A. 12mo, with maps, $1.00.

The first part of this book, Early Civilizations, discusses the antiquity of civilization in Egypt and the other early nations of the East. The second part, Ethnic Affinities in the Ancient World, is an examination of the ethnology of Genesis, showing its accordance with the latest results of modern ethnographical science.

CONGREGATIONALIST.—“A work of genuine scholarly excellence, and a useful offset to a great deal of the superficial current literature on such subjects.”

MANUAL OF MYTHOLOGY. For the Use of Schools, Art Students, and General Readers. Founded on the Works of Petiscus, Preller, and Welcker. By ALEXANDER S. MURRAY, Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities, British Museum. With 45 Plates on tinted paper, representing more than 90 Mythological Subjects. Reprinted from the Second Revised London Edition. Crown 8vo, $1.75.

THE CLEVELAND HERALD.—“It has been acknowledged the best work on the subject to be found in a concise form, and as it embodies the results of the latest researches and discoveries in ancient mythologies, it is superior for school and general purposes as a hand book to any of the so-called standard works.”

THE BOSTON JOURNAL.—“Whether as a manual for reference, a text book for school use, or for the general reader, the book will be found very valuable and interesting.”

THE REFORMATION. By Prof. GEORGE P. FISHER, D.D.,
Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Yale College. Crown
8vo, $2.50.

THE CHRISTIAN UNION.—"The book is a remarkable instance of that power of lucid condensation which its author possesses in a high degree. * * * The quality of condensedness renders it worthy to be studied, not merely read; and it would be excellent as a text-book in college. The references are full and valuable, and the chronological table and list of authorities will be appreciated by all students."

PROF. CHARLES A. AIKEN, D.D., Princeton Theological Seminary.—"Professor Fisher's History of the Reformation presents the results of prolonged, extended, and exact study, with those excellent qualities of style which are so characteristic of him—clearness, smoothness, judicial fairness, vividness, felicity in arranging material, as well as in grouping and delineating characters. It must become not only a library favorite, but a popular manual, where such a work is required for instruction and study. For such uses it seems to me admirably adapted."

THE ANCIENT EMPIRES OF THE EAST. By Prof. A. H. SAYCE, of Oxford. 12mo, $1.50.

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.—"Here the life and history of the ancient civilizations have been sketched on the authority of the monuments they have themselves bequeathed. The work is indispensable to all who would keep pace with the latest movements of modern research."

THE S. S. TIMES.—"Prof. Sayce's history is the best popular book in its field. It is abreast of modern research; its point of view is broad and comprehensive, and its style is such as to commend it to the wide public to which it is addressed."

THE JOURNAL OF EDUCATION.—"Mr. Sayce is recognized as the leading Assyriologist of our day, and has given in this valuable book the latest results of the latest researches into the mysterious antiquity of the ancient Oriental civilizations. He gives us information not to be found elsewhere, and much which lies dispersed in periodicals of only limited circulation. It is indispensable for every student of history."

HISTORICAL OUTLINE OF THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION FOR BEGINNERS. By D. W. RANNIE. 12mo, $1.00.

THE N. Y. SUN.—"As a compendium of the cardinal events and accepted principles of constitutional history it may be cordially recommended to those who are beginning the study of a political system."

THE BOSTON COURIER.—"The book is a very valuable manual for young people. The manner is clear and simple, and the outlines are clear and accurate."

EPOCHS OF HISTORY.

CHARLES KENDALL ADAMS, President of Cornell University.—"A Series of concise and carefully prepared volumes on special eras of history. Each is devoted to a group of events of such importance as to entitle it to be regarded as an epoch. Each is also complete in itself, and has no especial connection with the other members of the series. The works are all written by authors selected by the editor on account of some especial qualifications for a portrayal of the period they respectively describe. The volumes form an excellent collection, especially adapted to the wants of a general reader."

NOAH PORTER, President of Yale College.—"The 'Epochs of History' seem to me to have been prepared with knowledge and artistic skill to meet the wants of a large number of readers. To the young they furnish an outline or compendium which may serve as an introduction to more extended study. To those who are older they present a convenient sketch of the heads of the knowledge which they have already acquired. The outlines are by no means destitute of spirit, and may be used with great profit for family reading, and in select classes or reading clubs."

BISHOP JOHN F. HURST, Ex-President of Drew Theological Seminary.—"It appears to me that the idea of Morris in his Epochs is strictly in harmony with the philosophy of history—namely, that great movements should be treated not according to narrow geographical and national limits and distinction, but universally, according to their place in the general life of the world. The historical Maps and the copious Indices are welcome additions to the volumes."

THE NATION.—"The volumes contain the ripe results of the studies of men who are authorities in their respective fields."

EPOCHS OF ANCIENT HISTORY. A series of books narrating the History of Greece and Rome, and of their relations to other countries at successive epochs. Edited by Rev. G. W. COX, and CHARLES SANKEY, M.A. Eleven volumes, 16mo, with 41 Maps and Plans. Sold separately. Price per vol., $1.00. The set, Roxburgh style, gilt top, in box, $11.00.

TROY—ITS LEGEND, HISTORY, AND LITERATURE. By S. G. W. BENJAMIN.

THE GREEKS AND THE PERSIANS. By G. W. Cox.

THE ATHENIAN EMPIRE. By G. W. Cox.

THE SPARTAN AND THEBAN SUPREMACIES. By CHARLES SANKEY.

THE MACEDONIAN EMPIRE. By A. M. CURTEIS.

EARLY ROME. By W. IHNE.

ROME AND CARTHAGE. The Punic Wars. By R. BOSWORTH SMITH.

THE GRACCHI, MARIUS AND SULLA. By A. H. BEESLEY.

THE ROMAN TRIUMVIRATES. By CHARLES MERIVALE.

THE EARLY EMPIRE. By W. WOLFE CAPES.

THE AGE OF THE ANTONINES. By W. WOLFE CAPES.

EPOCHS OF MODERN HISTORY. A series of books narrating the History of England and Europe at successive epochs subsequent to the Christian era. Edited by EDWARD E. MORRIS. Seventeen volumes, 16mo, with 74 Maps, Plans, and Tables. Sold separately. Price per vol., $1.00. The set, Roxburgh style, gilt top, in box, $17.00.

THE BEGINNING OF THE MIDDLE AGES. By R. W. CHURCH.

THE NORMANS IN EUROPE. By A. H. JOHNSON.

THE CRUSADES. By G. W. COX, M.A.

THE EARLY PLANTAGENETS. By WM. STUBBS.

EDWARD III. By W. WARBURTON.

THE HOUSES OF LANCASTER AND YORK. By JAMES GAIRDNER.

THE ERA OF THE PROTESTANT REVOLUTION. By FREDERIC SEEBOHM. With Notes on Books in English relating to the Reformation. By Prof. GEORGE P. FISHER, D.D.

THE EARLY TUDORS. Henry VII.; Henry VIII. By C. E. MOBERLY.

THE AGE OF ELIZABETH. By M. CREIGHTON.

THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR, 1618-1648. By SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER.

THE PURITAN REVOLUTION. By SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER.

THE FALL OF THE STUARTS. By EDWARD HALE.

THE AGE OF ANNE. By EDWARD E. MORRIS.

THE EARLY HANOVERIANS. By EDWARD E. MORRIS.

FREDERICK THE GREAT. By F. W. LONGMAN.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION AND FIRST EMPIRE. By WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS. With Appendix by ANDREW D. WHITE, LL.D.

THE EPOCH OF REFORM, 1830-1850. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

THE HISTORY OF ROME, from the Earliest Time to the Period of Its Decline. By Dr. THEODOR MOMMSEN. Translated, with the author's sanction and additions, by W. P. DICKSON, D.D., LL.D. With an Introduction by Dr. Leonhard Schmitz. Reprinted from the Revised London Edition. Four volumes crown 8vo, gilt top. Price per set, $8.00.

LONDON TIMES.—"A work of the very highest merit; its learning is exact and profound; its narrative full of genius and skill; its descriptions of men are admirably vivid. We wish to place on record our opinion that Dr. Mommsen's is by far the best history of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Commonwealth."

DR. SCHMITZ.—"Since the days of Niebuhr, no work on Roman History has appeared that combines so much to attract, instruct, and charm the reader. Its style—a rare quality in a German author—is vigorous, spirited, and animated. Professor Mommsen's work can stand a comparison with the noblest productions of modern history."

AN ADDITION TO THEODOR MOMMSEN'S HISTORY OF ROME.

THE PROVINCES OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. From Cæsar to Diocletian. By THEODOR MOMMSEN. Translated with the author's sanction and additions, by William P. Dickson, D.D., LL.D. With ten maps, by Professor Kiepert. 2 vols., 8vo, $6.00.

CONTENTS: The Northern Frontier of Italy—Spain—The Gallic Provinces—Roman Germany and the Free Germans—Britain—The Danubian Lands and the Wars on the Danube—Greek Europe—Asia Minor—The Euphrates Frontier and the Parthians—Syria and the Land of the Nabataeans—Judea and the Jews—Egypt—The African Provinces.

N. Y. SUN.—“Professor Mommsen's work goes further than any other extant, or now looked for, to provide us with a key to the mediæval history of the Mediterranean world.”

PROF. W. A. PACKARD, in Presbyterian Review.—“The author draws the wonderfully rich and varied picture of the conquest and administration of that great circle of peoples and lands which formed the empire of Rome outside of Italy, their agriculture, trade, and manufactures, their artistic and scientific life, through all degrees of civilization, with such detail and completeness as could have come from no other hand than that of this great master of historical research in all its departments, guided by that gift of historical imagination, for which he is equally eminent.”

THE HISTORY OF GREECE. By Prof. Dr. ERNST CURTIUS. Translated by Adolphus William Ward, M. A., Fellow of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, Prof. of History in Owen's College, Manchester. Uniform with Mommsen's History of Rome. Five volumes, crown 8vo, gilt top. Price per set, $10.00.

LONDON ATHENÆUM.—“Professor Curtius' eminent scholarship is a sufficient guarantee for the trustworthiness of his history, while the skill with which he groups his facts, and his effective mode of narrating them, combine to render it no less readable than sound. Prof. Curtius everywhere maintains the true dignity and impartiality of history, and it is evident his sympathies are on the side of justice, humanity, and progress.”

LONDON SPECTATOR.—“We cannot express our opinion of Dr. Curtius' book better than by saying that it may be fitly ranked with Theodor Mommsen's great work.”

N. Y. DAILY TRIBUNE.—“As an introduction to the study of Grecian history, no previous work is comparable to the present for vivacity and picturesque beauty, while in sound learning and accuracy of statement it is not inferior to the elaborate productions which enrich the literature of the age.”

CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES AND HOMILETICS.

THE GROUNDS OF THEISTIC AND CHRISTIAN BELIEF. By Prof. GEORGE P. FISHER, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Yale College. Crown 8vo, $2.50.

FROM THE PREFACE.—“This volume embraces a discussion of the evidence of both natural and revealed religion. Prominence is given to topics having special interest at present from their connection with modern theories and difficulties. The argument of design, and the bearing of evolutionary doctrines on its validity, are fully considered. I have sought to direct the reader into lines of reflection which may serve to impress him with the truth contained in the remark that the strongest proof of Christianity is afforded by Christianity itself, and by Christendom as an existing fact. I venture to indulge the hope that they may derive from it some aid in clearing up perplexities, and some new light upon the nature of the Christian faith and its relation to the Scriptures.”

JULIUS H. SEELYE, President of Amherst College.—“I find it as I should expect it to be, wise and candid, and convincing to an honest mind. I congratulate you upon its publication, in which you seem to me to have rendered a high public service.”

PROF. JAMES O. MURRAY, of Princeton College.—“The volume meets here a great want, and meets it well. It is eminently fitted to meet the honest doubts of some of our best young men. Its fairness and candor, its learning and ability in argument, its thorough handling of modern objections—all these qualities fit it for such a service, and a great service it is.”

ESSAYS ON THE SUPERNATURAL ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY. By Prof. GEORGE P. FISHER, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Yale College. 8vo, new and enlarged edition, $2.50.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.—“Able and scholarly essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity, in which Prof. Fisher discusses such subjects as the genuineness of the Gospel of John, Baur's view of early Christian History and Literature, and the mythical theory of Strauss.”

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.—“His volume evinces rare versatility of intellect, with a scholarship no less sound and judicious in its tone and extensive in its attainments than it is modest in its pretensions.”

THE BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.—“We know not where the student will find a more satisfactory guide in relation to the great questions which have grown up between the friends of the Christian revelation and the most able of its assailants, within the memory of the present generation.”

THE PHILOSOPHIC BASIS OF THEISM. An Examination of the Personality of Man, to Ascertain his Capacity to Know and Serve God, and the Validity of the Principle Underlying the Defense of Theism. By SAMUEL HARRIS, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology in Yale College. 8vo, $3.50.

Dr. Harris embodies in his work the results of his long meditation on the highest themes, and his long discussion and presentation of these truths in the class-room. His fundamental positions are thoroughly in harmony with soundest modern thought and most trustworthy modern knowledge.

THE INDEPENDENT.—“It is rare that a work, which is of necessity, so severely metaphysical in both topics and treatment, is so enlivened by the varied contributions of a widely cultivated mind from a liberal course of reading. His passionate and candid argument cannot fail to command the respect of any antagonist of the Atheistic or Agnostic schools, who will take the pains to read his criticisms or to review his argument. In respect to coolness and dignity and self-possession, his work is an excellent model for scientists, metaphysicians, and theologians of every complexion.”

THE HARTFORD COURANT.—“Professor Harris' horizon-lines are uncontracted. His survey of the entire realm he traverses is accurate, patient, and considerate. No objections are evaded. No conclusions are reached by saltatory movements. The utmost fairness and candor characterize his discussions. No more thoroughly scientific work in plan or method or spirit has been done in our time. On almost every page one meets with evidences of a wide and reflective reading, not only of philosophy, but of poetry and fiction as well, which enriches and illumines the whole course of thought.”

THE SELF-REVELATION OF GOD. By SAMUEL HARRIS, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology in Yale College. 8vo, $3.50.

In this volume Dr. Harris presents a statement of the evidence of the existence of God, and of the reality of His revelation of Himself in the experience or consciousness of men, and the verification of the same by His further revelation of Himself in the constitution and ongoing of the universe, and in Christ.

PROF. WM. G. T. SHEDD, D.D., in The Presbyterian Review.—“Such a work is not brought out in a day, but is the growth of years of professional study and reflection. Few books on apologetics have been recently produced that will be more influential and formative upon the mind of the theological or philosophical student, or more useful. It is calculated to influence opinions, and to influence them truthfully, seriously, and strongly.”

BISHOP HURST, in The Northwestern Christian Advocate.—“We do not know a better work among recent publications than this one for building up old hopes and giving a new strength to one's faith. The book is thoroughly evangelic, fresh, and well wrought out. It is a valuable contribution to our American theology.”

THE THEORY OF PREACHING; or, Lectures on Homiletics.
By Professor AUSTIN PHELPS. 8vo, $2.50.

This work is the growth of more than thirty years' practical experience in teaching. The writings of a master of style, of broad and catholic mind are always fascinating; in the present case the wealth of appropriate and pointed illustration renders this doubly the case.

THE NEW YORK CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.—“Ministers of all denominations and of all degrees of experience will rejoice in it as a veritable mine of wisdom.”

THE INDEPENDENT.—“The volume is to be commended to young men as a superb example of the art in which it aims to instruct them.”

THE WATCHMAN.—“The reading of it is a mental tonic. The preacher cannot but feel often his heart burning within him under its influence. We could wish it might be in the hands of every theological student and of every pastor.”

MEN AND BOOKS; OR, STUDIES IN HOMILETICS. Lectures
Introductory to the “Theory of Preaching.” By Professor AUSTIN PHELPS, D.D. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

Professor Phelps' second volume of lectures is devoted to a discussion of the sources of culture and power in the profession of the pulpit, its power to absorb and appropriate to its own uses the world of real life in the present, and the world of the past, as it lives in books.

PROFESSOR GEORGE P. FISHER.—“It is a live book, animated as well as sound and instructive, in which conventionalities are brushed aside, and the author goes straight to the marrow of the subject. No minister can read it without being waked up to a higher conception of the possibilities of his calling.”

BOSTON WATCHMAN.—“We are sure that no minister or candidate for the ministry can read it without profit. It is a tonic for one's mind to read a book so laden with thought and suggestion, and written in a style so fresh, strong, and bracing.”

A TREATISE ON HOMILETICS AND PASTORAL THEOLOGY.
By W. G. T. SHEDD, D.D. Crown 8vo, $2.50.

In this work, treating of the main points of Homiletics and Pastoral Theology, the author handles his subject in a masterly manner, and displays much original and highly suggestive thought. The Homiletical part is especially valuable to ministers and those in training for the ministry. Dr. Shedd's style is a model of purity, simplicity and strength.

THE NEW YORK EVANGELIST.—“We cannot but regard it as, on the whole, the very best production of the kind with which we are acquainted. The topics discussed are of the first importance to every minister of Christ engaged in active service, and their discussion is conducted by earnestness as well as ability, and in a style which for clear, vigorous, and unexceptionable English, is itself a model.”

THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER.—“The ablest book on the subject which the generation has produced.”

MENTAL AND MORAL SCIENCE.

AN OUTLINE STUDY OF MAN; or, the Body and Mind in One System. With illustrative diagrams. Revised edition. By MARK HOPKINS, D.D., LL.D., late President of Williams College. 12mo, $1.75.

This is a model of the developing method as applied to intellectual science. The work is on an entirely new plan. It presents man in his unity, and his several faculties and their relations are so presented to the eye in illustrative diagrams as to be readily apprehended. The work has come into very general use in this country as a manual for instruction, and the demand for it is increasing every year.

GENERAL S. C. ARMSTRONG, Principal of Hampton Institute.—"I am glad of the opportunity to express my high appreciation of Dr. Hopkins' Outline Study of Man. It has done more for me personally than any book besides the Bible. More than any other it teaches the greatest of lessons, know thyself. For over ten years, I have made it a text book in the Senior Class of this school. It is, I think, the greatest and most useful of the books of the greatest of our American educators, Rev. Dr. Hopkins, and is destined to do a great work in forming not only the ideas but the character of youth in America and in other parts of the world."

PROF. ADDISON BALLARD, of Lafayette College.—"I have for years used Dr. Hopkins' Outline Study of Man, in connection with his Law of Love, as a text book for our Senior Classes. I have done this with unflinching success and with increasing satisfaction. It is of incalculable advantage to the student to come under the influence, through his books, of this great master of thought and of style. I cannot speak of Outline Study in terms of too hearty commendation."

THE LAW OF LOVE, AND LOVE AS A LAW; or, Christian Ethics. By MARK HOPKINS, D.D., LL.D., late President of Williams College. 12mo, $1.75.

This work is designed to follow the author's Outline Study of Man. As its title indicates it is entirely an exposition of the cardinal precept of Christian philosophy in harmony with nature and on the basis of reason. Like the treatise on mental philosophy it is adapted with unusual skill to educational uses.

It appears in a new edition, which has been in part re-written in order to bring it into closer relation to his Outline Study of Man, of which work it is really a continuation. More prominence has been given to the idea of Rights, but the fundamental doctrines of the treatise have not been changed.

PSYCHOLOGY. By JAMES McCOSH, D.D., LL.D., President of Princeton College. I.—The Cognitive Powers. II.—The Motive Powers. 2 vols., 12mo. Sold separately. Each, $1.50.

The first volume contains an analysis of the operations of the senses, and of their relation to the intellectual processes, with a discussion of sense perception, from the physiological side, accompanied by appropriate cuts. A third of the book is devoted to the Reproductive or Representative Powers, including such subjects as the association of ideas, the power of composition, etc., concluding with a discussion of the Comparative Powers. The second volume treats of the Motive Powers, as they are called, the Orective, the Appetent, the Impulsive Powers; including the Conscience, Emotions, and Will.

PROFESSOR WILLIAM DE W. HYDE, of Bowdoin College.—“The book is written in a clear and simple style; it breathes a sweet and winning spirit; and it is inspired by a noble purpose. In these respects it is a model of what a text book should be.”

S. L. CALDWELL, late President of Vassar College.—“I have read the book with much interest. It is what was to have been expected from the ability and long experience of the author. The style is clear and simple; the matter is well distributed; it well covers the ground usually taught in such text books, and I am sure any teacher would find it a helpful guide in his classes.”

ELEMENTS OF PHYSIOLOGICAL PSYCHOLOGY. By GEORGE T. LADD, D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Yale University. With numerous illustrations. 8vo, $4.50.

Professor Ladd's “Physiological Psychology” is the first treatise that has attempted to present to English readers a discussion of the whole subject brought down to the most recent times. It includes the latest discoveries, and by numerous and excellent illustrations and tables, brings before the reader in a compact and yet lucid form the entire subject.

The work has three principal divisions, of which, the first consists of a description of the structure and functions of the Nervous System considered simply as a mechanism. The second part describes the various classes of correlations which exist between the phenomena of the nervous mechanism and mental phenomena, with the laws of these various classes. The third part presents such conclusions as may be legitimately gathered or inferred concerning the nature of the human mind.

PROF. WILLIAM JAMES in The Nation.—“His erudition, and his broad-mindedness are on a par with each other; and his volume will probably for many years to come be the standard work of reference on the subject.”

THE SCHOOL JOURNAL.—“It is impossible in a brief notice to give any adequate conception of the scientific character and practical application of this admirable volume. In its class it stands alone among American books. No thorough student of psychology will rest satisfied until he owns a copy of this work.”

FINAL CAUSES. By PAUL JANET, Member of the French Academy. With a Preface by Robert Flint, D.D., LL.D. From second French edition. 8vo, $2.50.

PROF. FRANCIS L. PATTON, of Princeton Theological Seminary.—"I regard Janet's 'Final Causes' as incomparably the best thing in literature on the subject of which it treats, and that it ought to be in the hands of every man who has any interest in the present phases of the theistic problem. I have recommended it to my classes in the seminary, and make constant use of it in my instructions."

NOAH PORTER, D.D., LL.D., late President of Yale College.—"I am delighted that you have published Janet's 'Final Causes' in an improved form and at a price which brings it within the reach of many who desire to possess it. It is, in my opinion, the most suggestive treatise on this important topic which is accessible in our language."

THE HUMAN INTELLECT. By NOAH PORTER, D.D., LL.D., late President of Yale College. With an Introduction upon Psychology and the Human Soul. 8vo, $5.00.

The author has not only designed to furnish a text book which shall be sufficiently comprehensive and scientific to satisfy the wants of the many students of psychology and speculative philosophy who are found in our higher institutions of learning, but also to prepare a volume which may guide the advanced student to a clear understanding and a just estimate of the questions which have perpetually appeared and reappeared in the history of philosophy.

THE BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.—"President Porter's work, the result of thirty years' professional labor, is not only the most important philosophical work that has appeared in our language since Sir William Hamilton's, but its form as a manual makes it invaluable to students."

THE PRINCETON REVIEW.—"After a careful examination of this truly great work, we are ready to pronounce it the most complete and exhaustive exhibition of the cognitive faculties of the human soul to be found in our language, and, so far as we know, in any language. The work is a monument of the author's insight, industry, learning, and judgment; one of the great productions of our time; an honor to our country, and a fresh proof that genuine philosophy has not died out among us."

ELEMENTS OF INTELLECTUAL SCIENCE. A Manual for Schools and Colleges. By NOAH PORTER, D.D., LL.D., late President of Yale College. 8vo, $3.00.

This is an abridgment of the author's "Human Intellect," containing all the matter necessary for use in the class-room, and has been introduced as a text-book in Yale, Dartmouth, Bowdoin, Oberlin, Bates, Hamilton, Vassar, and Smith Colleges; Wesleyan, Ohio, Lehigh, and Wooster Universities, and many other colleges, academies, normal and high schools.

THE NEW YORK WORLD.—"The abridgment is very well done, the statements being terse and perspicuous."

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.—"Presents the leading facts of intellectual science from the author's point of view, with clearness and vigor."

ELEMENTS OF MORAL SCIENCE, Theoretical and Practical.
 By NOAH PORTER, D.D., LL.D., late President of Yale College. 8vo, $3.00.

This treatise is intended primarily for the use of college and university students, and is prepared with reference to the class-room. It is in two parts: the first treats with great fullness "The Theory of Duty," and unfolds comprehensively the psychology of the moral powers and the nature of the moral relations. The second division, "The Practice of Duty or Ethics," takes up the different classes of duties with a view to the practical application of the principles of moral science to the questions arising in every department of human activity. In every respect President Porter's work is abreast of the time, and leaves no controverted point undefended.

GEORGE S. MORRIS, Professor of Ethics, University of Michigan.—"I have read the work with great interest, and parts of it with enthusiasm. It is a vast improvement on any of the current text books of ethics. It is tolerant and catholic in tone; not superficially, but soundly, inductive in method and tendency, and rich in practical suggestion."

E. G. ROBINSON, President Brown University.—"It has all the distinguishing marks of the author's work on 'The Human Intellect,' is full and comprehensive in its treatment, dealing largely with current discussions, and very naturally follows it as a text book for the class-room."

JULIUS H. SEELYE, President Amherst College.—"It is copious and clear, with ample scholarship and remarkable insight, and I am sure that all teachers of Moral Science will find it a valuable aid in their instructions."

OUTLINES OF MORAL SCIENCE. By ARCHIBALD ALEX-ANDER, D.D., LL.D. 12mo, $1.50.

This book is elementary in its character, and is marked by great clearness and simplicity of style. It is intended to lay the foundations and elucidate the principles of the Philosophy of Morals. It is widely used in colleges and other institutions of learning, and is specially adapted for students whose age, or the time at whose disposal, does not permit the use of the more extended and abstruse works on ethics.

THE THEORY OF MORALS. By PAUL JANET, Member of the French Academy. Translated under the supervision of President Noah Porter. 8vo, $2.50.

Prof. Janet in this book gives us not only a clear and concise examination of the whole study of moral science, but he has introduced into the discussion many elements which have hitherto been too much neglected. The first principles of moral science and the fundamental idea of morals the author describes with much precision, and presents an interesting and systematic exposition of them.

SCIENCE.—"The book has lucidity and is full of learning. It is hardly extravagant to say that so clear and picturesque a treatise, in the hands of an alert teacher, might save the study of ethics from its almost inevitable fate of being very dull."

70

111

